I support in principle the idea of marine nature reserves. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) has some reservations about this, but I do not believe that we have been unreasonably compelled in relation to land nature reserves. There are problems involving feeding grounds below high water level which are important to bird life. The principle of marine nature reserves has a place in the 1981 Act, and so far we have not made any practical progress. I hope that this legislation will assist.

I should like to refer to the balancing of the pressures on the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I have the feeling—I speak with a strong interest in farming with respect to my constituency and members of my family—that the Ministry is sometimes blinkered in its attitude to the projects it supports. In recent years, we have unnecessarily damaged uplands and wetlands by unwise schemes—sometimes promoted with EEC money—and unwise drainage projects on which, examined in a cooler light and without artificial subsidies, no farmer in his right mind would ever have embarked.

Food production is of course the primary function of the Ministry of Agriculture, but if we said in legislation that there was to be a better statutory balance between food production and conservation we would make an improvement that would be in the interests of the country as a whole. That is why the NFU and the CLA support the Bill.

Clause 1 relates to badger baiting. I think that there will be support for its objective on both sides of the House. No genuine sportsman has any truck with badger digging and badger baiting. If there are loopholes in the present legislation which can be sensibly closed without destroying or damaging other legitimate interests and those of legitimate sportsmen, it is desirable to close them.

I have had the benefit of speaking to the Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), and I know that what I say has his blessing. The clause seeks to introduce the concept of recklessness. People who kill badgers recklessly deserve short shrift from the courts, but at the moment the concept of recklessness in this context does not exist. There is a real practical problem, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough said, in that we cannot tell whether a series of underground holes happens at any particular time to be the home of badgers or foxes, or badgers, foxes and rabbits together. That underground system can be approached in a way that need not harm badgers. Our objective is to protect the badger.

If we introduce the concept of recklessness into the legislation—that is embodied in the clause, although it is profoundly mis-stated in the explanatory memorandum —we should all be satisifed.

Mr. Sidney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I recognise the legal expertise of my hon. and learned Friend in this technical matter. Are there not many precedents for what the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) is proposing? I draw my hon. and learned Friend's attention to section 25 of the Firearms Act 1968, which uses the phrase, "has reasonable cause".

Mr. Lyell: There are plenty of precedents in our law for introducing a criminal offence if someone does something recklessly which is dangerous to a member of the public or indeed to an animal. We are not there trespassing on difficult legal ground. But to do what is erroneously suggested in the explanatory memorandum and change the burden of proof and put it on to the defence is something that we rarely do in our law and a principle that we should approach with abhorrence. I am glad to understand from the hon. Member for South Shields that he does not intend to do that.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): As always, my hon. and learned Friend has researched his case carefully, and I bow to his knowledge of the law. Will he reassure the House that, in whatever amendments he and my hon. Friends seek to put in the Bill, no further loophole will be left? I understand what he says. I come from the country, and I am aware that setts are used by various animals. If he is going to err at all, will he err on the side of the badger?

Mr. Lyell: I can reassure my hon. Friend, although as a lawyer I always seek to err on the side of justice; I think that my hon. Friend will agree with that.

We can always protect something to the nth degree, but if we go to the nth degree we may find that we are doing a grave injustice to individuals, and I am sure that my hon. Friend would not wish to do that. My objective and that of the hon. Member for South Shields is to do away with badger baiting and digging. We can make a real advance on that by using the concept of recklessness.

I should like to reassure the House that generally the Badgers Act 1973 works quite well. There may be occasions when it does not work, but Home Office figures show that in 1983 there were 57 prosecutions, of which no fewer than 50 were successful. Many prosecuting officers would be happy with that rate of success. I do not know the rate of successes for 1984, but my researches show that there have been at least 33 successful prosecutions in 1984. People are being brought to book. If we introduce the concept of recklessness, we shall help substantially if not wholly to close every reasonable loophole. I shall work to assist the Bill in that respect.

[Mr. Lyell]

The improvement of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 is something which I, in common with so many of my hon. Friends—as their presence shows—welcome wholeheartedly.

11.55 am

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I shall be extremely brief, largely because every hon. Member who has spoken has accepted the Bill's broad principles. There have been reservations about some details but not one hon. Member has signified his intention of opposing the Bill. The main purpose of my remarks will be to try, first, to set an example to the House by being brief and to urge every other hon. Member who follows me to be brief. I should have been even briefer had it not been for the long speech of the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr). He let down the cause of conservation with which he has so long been associated and which in recent years he seems to serve so inadequately.

When discussing the Wildlife and Countryside Bill, the hon. Member for Harborough may recall that we were always on opposite sides of the argument as he sought to extend the list of creatures which could be destroyed and weaken the protection that hon. Members sought to confer on our natural heritage. He has done that again this morning. That is sad, because 10 years ago at about this time of the year, I moved the Second Reading of the Conservation of Wild Creatures and Wild Plants Bill. That went through the House and it had the hon. Gentleman's support. The Bill received its Second Reading before 11.30 am because fewer hon. Members sought to take part in the debate.

One hon. Member who took part in that debate was the former Member for South Shields and I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), who succeeded Arthur Blenkinsop, has maintained that north-eastern tradition—a tradition that has long been served by my party, which has been far more devoted to the natural heritage than it has to individual privilege and fortune in rural shires.

I am not seeking to be aggressive, because there are Conservative Members who have served the cause of conservation. I was glad to hear the intervention by the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) in the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell). I trust that there will be no further nit-picking in the debate to imperil the Bill. My hon. Friend said that the Labour Opposition had sought to co-operate with the Government to ensure that there would be a broad Government measure so that we could see a proper advance. The Minister took the view—there is a great deal to be said for it—that we need a sustained and serious review of the operation of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and that there would have to be major legislation some years hence.

My hon. Friend's approach, which has dominated this Bill, and the approach that I adopted in the summer when I tried to block the three-month loophole, was not to contradict the Government's view that there must be a major review and reappraisal of the Act, but to try to close those loopholes which needed urgently to be closed. That is my hon. Friend's purpose. Those who think that he may have gone too far should recognise that we have already made enormous concessions to try to meet the problems of Government timetables and parliamentary procedure. We could not seek any further reduction in the provisions of the Bill unless we were prepared to accept that this would affect millions of people and scores of organisations that are passionately concerned with the conservation of our natural heritage.

There will soon be further pressure for amendment of the Wildlife and Countryside Act, although perhaps not in the next two years. I have been given approval by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe to start a detailed monitoring of the Berne convention in every member state. The Minister knows that that Act was the British response to that convention. The Assembly seems dissatisfied with the situation in many member countries and serious monitoring will take place this year. I hope that, when I carry out that monitoring and report to the Parliamentary Assembly in a year or so, I shall be able to say that the Government have been helpful to this Bill.

I trust that, on badger baiting and such barbaric practices, there will be no more attempts at a nit-picking approach to justice. The sort of people to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) referred in a distinguished speech should not be allowed to get off. If people who are more concerned that the law is neat allow that species to be eradicated, they will deserve condemnation. In my area, 20 years ago, there were 29 occupied badger setts. Today there are two, and that small population is in threat of being wiped out if something is not done urgently. Unfortunately, with a continuation of the cautious response displayed by the hon. Member for Harborough who has been in possession of large areas of land long enough to know rather more about badgers and foxes than he displayed today, the badger will be wiped out in many areas. There will then be fewer prosecutions.

There may have been fewer prosecutions in 1984 than in 1983, but that is because, in south and west Yorkshire, Merseyside, west Lancashire, large areas of the south-west and in the county areas around every conurbation there are few badgers left. That is why I hope that my hon. Friend will insist that clause 1 remains in the Bill. I hope that with it will go an acceptance by the Government that the Ministry of Agriculture and the Forestry Commission must start to pay heed not to the small minority of those who farm the land but to the vast majority who want a decent countryside retained.

12.6 pm

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I am always glad to follow the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), whose interest and sincerity in protecting the countryside is well known.

I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clarke) on introducing the Bill. I saw him in the preparation of it, and I was greatly impressed by the intelligence and courtesy with which he got everyone together and his understanding of the issues at stake. I also admire his tenacity in insisting that the Bill went further than was immediately welcomed. It is always important to push bureaucracy in the right direction.

We always welcome extra protection for the badger, and therefore I do not intend to dwell on that part of the Bill. I shall move on to what I consider to be the heart of the Bill and the heart of all our efforts on conservation and that is the effort to protect habitat. It is no use protecting animals or plants if their habitat has vanished. For example, one can protect absolutely the shoveler duck, but if its wetland breeding grounds are drained it will simply disappear, as brutally as an hon. Member whose consituency is redistributed.

Part II of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 sought to protect habitat. It was a hugely complex Bill, but it made a brave attempt to protect the most special sites. Some flaws in it have appeared, the chief of which are the two major loopholes to which we have referred. We all welcome the plugging of those two main loopholes by clause 2. In particular, I admire the ingenuity with which the deficiency in clause 29 is made good. Given the right attitude of the Nature Conservancy Council, that provision will work. Clause 2, which must be passed, will stop the ignorant or malicious destruction of our best sites, which has occurred since 1981.

I also welcome the determination of the Bill to make marine nature reserves a reality, for, after all, that was the intention of the 1981 Act. That intention has always been frustrated, and therefore the House should not object to efforts to try to make that intention a reality. I understand the dilemma of my hon. Friend the Minister in this respect. After all, we all believe in persuasion, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) said, but there must come a time when, if persuasion fails, regulations must come to the fore.

I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to examine this point carefully. At some stage, we must have marine nature reserves. When is the first one likely to be set up? Is it likely to be set up at all? If not, is it not perfectly reasonable to ask for some regulation, which we already have, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) said, on the land. Some 60 countries already have marine conservation areas, yet we, who pride ourselves on conservation, have none. Our coasts form perhaps the most magnificent and unusual of all aspects of our national heritage. We are right to seek powers to protect those areas for posterity.

Since 1981 the public's and the Government's concept of conservation has changed. The remarkable success of farming means that we have entered a period of agricultural surpluses, and the whole system of support for agriculture is under question. Increasingly, agriculture and farming must become more sympathetic to conservation. At the same time, it remains a principle that farming has to be profitable if spare resources are to be available for conservation and if the fabric of country life is to prosper.

This excellent Bill reflects the change in attitudes towards farming and the countryside. In 1981 our efforts were concentrated, rightly, on protecting the most important habitats. Now we are starting to serve important habitats elsewhere in the wider countryside. Isolated SSSIs dotted around the country like oases in a desert are inadequate. The intervening farmland must also provide habitat. That is why I welcome clause 4. It is right that Ministers at the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food should have a duty to further conservation. After all, we accepted that principle in 1981 for the water authorities. In an era of costly surpluses it is one thing to farm existing farmland as well as we can, but another to destroy scarce habitats with the help of subsidies to add to costly surpluses.

The Ministry of Agriculture has a great challenge to see whether it can adjust this policy and develop it to achieve the harmony that we wish to see in the countryside. In this respect, I greatly welcome the support of the Country Landowners Association and the timely conversion of the NFU. The NFU is wise to say that it wishes not only to have successful agriculture, but for that success to take place in a countryside that is seen to have the right balance between production and conservation and to make farming attractive again to people in all parts of the country.

Ultimately, the farmer has to be the steward of the countryside. The protection of the habitat outside those very special sites must depend upon his actions. Therefore, it is welcome news that the Country Landowners Association and the National Farmers Union have joined forces to play a constructive role and to support the additional burden that will be placed upon farming in order to bring about harmony in the countryside. The Ministry of Agriculture has a real duty and responsibility to respond to the wishes of people outside the Government.

The challenge of conservation in the wider countryside opens up a huge subject for debate. Many important matters of principle are at stake. No doubt my hon. Friend the Minister is having many sleepless nights as he ponders the conflicts to which the Bill gives rise. Our aim today is not to address those wider aspects, but to take a modest but nevertheless very important step forward. All of our efforts to protect the countryside depend upon progress being made step by step. We have to meet the problems as they arise and provide for them. We have to be practical in so doing. I believe that the Bill is practical and that it deserves a Second Reading, because it reflects the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the British people.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On behalf of my party, I strongly support the tribute that has been paid to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). I fully endorse the Bill. I know that the hon. Gentleman has tried to achieve as much as possible by introducing it. Many hon. Members realise that if he had had his way he would have wished to achieve much more, but that is not a criticism. The hon. Gentleman has sought to advance the cause with which he is associated and for which he has campaigned for many years. I hope that the Minister will respond favourably to the initiatives that have been taken.

It is an anomaly that the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment is described in the most recent edition of Countryside Commission News as representing an entirely urban seat. The constituency of the hon. Member for South Shields, who is the spokesman for the Labour party, is described as one of the few constituencies with probably no green field in it. As spokesman for the environment on behalf of the Liberal party, I can hardly be described, as the Member of Parliament for Southwark and Bermondsey, as representing the most rural seat in Britain. This shows that the issues transcend geographical boundaries. The Bill affects not just those who live in rural areas but those who live in urban areas. They need the rural environment to be preserved for their own cultural and recreational enjoyment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): I must have a word with the Countryside Commission about this, because there is no green field in Bristol, West.

Mr. Hughes: I do not deny that fact. However, it confirms that although the three spokesmen all represent urban constituencies we have much wider interests. I hope that today it will be evident that the Under-Secretary has taken a considerable step forward. On 2 May 1984, in answer to a question from his hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) about representations relating to the amendment of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, he listed the representations which had been received from the Nature Conservancy Council, the Friends of the Earth, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy).

Yet on 9 May 1984, when the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and I appeared at a rally held by the Green alliance prior to the European Parliament elections, he said that there was no real evidence that the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 had failed, although the Government were monitoring it closely. I believe that the Minister must accept that it was seen very early to have failed and that therefore urgent steps were necessary to remedy those defects. That is the first reason why we welcome the Bill so strongly and accept entirely what was said by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) that we must continue to make sure that other steps are taken and that we do not just stop here.

The greatest loss to our heritage has occurred since the war. That loss has continued alongside our understandable drive for agricultural self-sufficiency. Before the second world war, only two thirds at most of our food was produced in Britain. Now we have surpluses, including about 3·8 million tonnes of surplus grain. The race for food production is encouraged by the Government who, understandably, have subsidised the farmers to bring new land under tillage. This is all well and good, but when ancient woodlands or hay meadows containing rare species of flora and fauna or ponds, bogs or marshes which support wildlife populations are threatened — examples were given by the hon. Member for Lincoln — our farming policies have to be reviewed. Therefore, the prime objective of the Bill is to close the loophole relating to sites of special scientific interest.

The most fundamental change represented by the Bill is the beginning of a realisation that agriculture as well as other elements of the use of the countryside have to be brought under the hand and the influence of environmental policies. We cannot continue to lose our natural heritage in this way. My party takes the view that, when dealing with farmers and the agriculture industry in general, there is little room for compromise when trying to preserve what remains of our heritage.

Since 1981, sites of special scientific interest have been destroyed at the rate of 13 per cent. a year. Therefore, we have to do all that we can to ensure that the inbuilt delays in the system, which are specifically dealt with in clause 2, and the inbuilt inadequacies, are overcome.

Last year, I saw a report that was put before the other place by the Council for the Protection of Rural England and the Council for the National Parks, which stated that a large part of Suffolk has lost four fifths of its hedges, that Devon has lost one fifth of its woodland in a decade and that 1,500 acres of the Norfolk broads are being drained every year, and 5,000 acres are under imminent threat. Prehistoric parts of Britain, like the south Dorset ridgeway, have been ploughed up.

During the past year, I have asked questions about the loss of moorland by ploughing and afforestation in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. The figures are substantial. In England, the recorded annual average decrease of rough grazing, excluding common land, during the last six or seven years amounts to 3,000 hectares.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has produced a report dealing with the effects of hill farming on birds. Its statistics show that neither the Ministry of Agriculture nor the Department of the Environment knows exactly what the effects have been. There has been no monitoring of the effects of hill farming on birds. Therefore, we have to ensure that there is a Department which can protect the environment and act as a proper counterweight to other less good influences.

Every hon. Member knows what is needed. When a wood is about to be destroyed, people make representations and say that they do not want that wood destroyed. In the borough of Southwark, part of which is in my constituency, Sydenham Hill wood, one of the remaining very old woodlands in the south of England, is under threat. There is a very strong lobby against its destruction by the London Wildlife Trust. But it is primarily the local people who are fighting by means of a public inquiry to protect that wood.

It is important, let me reiterate, to view the Bill as a trail blazer for a new attitude of compromise and consensus. That does not mean compromise upon principles of conservation but compromise to prevent vested interests from standing in the way of what should be our environmental priorities.

We strongly believe that we need to go further not only in setting up a proper environmental protection section at the Department of the Environment but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) said in response to the 10th report of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution, in ensuring that all legislation includes an environmental impact statement, because planning, housing and trade and industry legislation, for example, may all carve up our heritage sometimes without our realising it.

At the end of 1983, Friends of the Earth sent my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) a proposal for a natural heritage Bill. I am sure that the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) and many other Members share our hope that that will soon be possible. My party and its leader have no reservations at all about that. I do not seek to be exclusive about it. We all pay tribute to the hon. Member for South Shields for his long campaign on these issues and to the many people in all parts of the House and in parties not even represented here who have argued so strongly and effectively for that kind of approach. The proposal for a natural heritage Bill is my party's policy and I believe that it is increasingly supported outside as the right way to proceed. The Countryside Commission has asked for a comprehensive White Paper on the management of our rural estate. That might be the best move to make next.

It may be thought that the Bill does not touch many chords for people in north Southwark, but I have received letters about badger baiting which show that people trapped in inner-city tower blocks feel equally strongly that what has been proposed must be carried out. I believe that the wording set out in the Under-Secretary's letter to Lord Melchett of 7 January is better than the wording in the Bill, but perhaps that can be discussed in Committee. We must ensure that prosecutions are effective and that we do not have to rely on private prosecutions.

I quote from just one of the many letters that I have received. A constituent, now a pensioner, living on the Heygate estate in Walworth, writes for the first time ever to a Member of Parliament because feelings have become so strong. My constituent concludes:

"All my friends and neighbours are with me on this, for there is so much cruelty practised on animals that we must do our utmost to avert some of it. Therefore, if you would vote in support of the Bill we would be very grateful."

I could scarcely do otherwise, as the League Against Cruel Sports has its headquarters in my constituency.

Clause 2 is urgently needed and is very welcome, as is clause 3, dealing with protection of the marine environment. The latter recognises that the voluntary option does not always work and that one needs to go further when response is inadequate.

Clause 4 is perhaps the most important, as it puts agriculture in the context of the environment, as it should be although we appreciate the need to seek progress by conciliation. In this context, the House of Lords Select Committee stated in paragraph 129 of its 20th report on "Agriculture and the Environment":

"The Committee believe that common ground can increasingly be found, especially if Government departments are prepared to take steps to encourage conciliatory moves."

In the context of an EEC draft resolution, paragraph 138 states:

"The Preamble and Articles . . . should be altered to establish that, as an element of the improvement of farming, care of the environment should have comparable status with the production of food."

We need to press even more strongly for that.

The House of Commons Select Committee fell short of some of the recommendations that I should like, such as making agriculture subject to planning constraints, but I was glad to note that it recommended not just that the existing system of prior notification in national parks should be extended to the whole of the countryside, for which I pressed last year, but also in paragraph 73:

"Without fundamental changes in the structure of agricultural finance, conservation will continue to be set in weak opposition to the forces of intensive and, paradoxically, frequently unwanted production, instead of being an integral part of good husbandry, as it should be."

It goes on to make the straightforward statement:

"MAFF must reappraise its attitudes."

In all its aspects and each of its clauses, the Bill should, and I hope will, be supported. It has frequently been said that this is a time of change. The National Farmers Union and others have moved. But if the climate is one of change, it is also a time of trial and we look to the Government not to be found wanting. As I have said, there is little room for compromise or concession if our environment and our heritage are not to be lost. As we know all too well, once lost means lost for ever.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): In adding my voice to those who have expressed support for the Bill, and in adding my congratulations to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), I must express one or two reservations abut the Opposition's attitude to farmers and farming. I declare an interest as a farmer. As a member of both the Country Landowners Association and the National Farmers Union, I am delighted that those organisations also support the Bill. I have no doubt that what is proposed is correct, although some details will require examination in Committee.

I am, however, saddened by some of the attacks made by the Opposition from time to time. They have not been so bad today, when we are generally in unison in supporting the Bill, but there is still an undercurrent of hostility to the farming industry. I wish to say a word or two in defence of my farming colleagues and of the industry as a whole. Many of the attacks on the way in which farmers look after the environment are ill founded and based more on ignorance than on malice.

I say that the attacks are ill founded because farming is not a static industry. There seems to be an underlying assumption that if the farmers left the land altogether we should return to the idyllic scenes portrayed by John Constable — little fields with cows grazing, hedges blooming and birds flying everywhere—and everything would be marvellous. Nothing could be further from the truth. There were no hedges or little fields until the enclosure Acts altered farming 200 or 300 years ago. Indeed, before that we had something far more akin to the prairie farming to which the Opposition take such exception today. I do not like it either. I regard it as extremely unpleasant and I hope that, partly thanks to the Bill, but largely thanks to the 1981 Act, there will be a return to a far more conservation-minded approach to farming.

It is wrong to single out farmers as the villains of the piece. Since the 1960s and 1970s, in planning and other aspects, there has been an unfortunate falling away from the standards which we now all recognise should be followed. We must regard farming in the context of the European scene in which we operate. Anyone who travels abroad and drives through France will notice that the prairie farming in the once-beautiful countryside round Paris makes the prairie farming in Britain look like paddock farming. Our farmers must be able to compete, as every industrial business must be able to compete, in its markets. Although I regret bitterly the fact that prairie farming is increasing, it would not be right to blame the British farmer for that development.

Mr. Flannery: I accept most of what the hon. Gentleman says, but is it not true that, from the point of not producing enough food, we have reached a stage of over-production? Should we not have regard to that fact in the context of conservation?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I accept the accuracy of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. The over-production of food is a subject for much wider debate, because we over-produce food only for the markets which are currently capable of buying our products. If we could find better ways of introducing the Third world into the international market and generating new revenue there, there would be no shortage of people who wished to eat the food produced by the European Community and the United States. We must be careful, having made the mistake of going from under-production to over-production, that we do not swing back again during the next 20 years to 30 years and return to a position where food is in short supply.

History shows that it is more than probable that that will happen, because almost always when one takes corrective action of the sort proposed in the Bill one swings it too far. I hope that we can avoid that pitfall and that Opposition

[Sir Nicholas Bonsor]

Members will join my hon. Friends in ensuring that we do not place so much emphasis away from food production that we fall into that danger in the longer term.

I have said enough about farming and the approach to the environmental controls that are proposed. I shall say a few words on each of the clauses. The most important is undoubtedly clause 2, which closes the loopholes which people have used to get round the 1981 Act and to destroy deliberately and maliciously those parts of the countryside which the Government and the Countryside Commission had decided should be preserved. Clearly, that was wrong, and something had to be done to prevent such abuse. However, we must realise that only a very few people behave so appallingly.

One must put in a cautionary word. Where only one or two people are breaking the law, it is not always the answer to make controls tighter and criminal legislation even stricter. If we did that, we should burden the entire state with over-strict regulations and make life impossible for the innocent, in order to catch the few who are guilty. However, there have been enough cases of people taking no notice of the laws which have been passed to justifiy the steps being proposed today, and I fully support the way in which the loopholes will be closed. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir. H. Rossi) asked whether loopholes would remain at the end of this procedure, and we must consider that carefully in Committee.

The other clauses are also important, and I am glad that the hon. Member for South Shields has included them in his Bill. I appreciate, having tried to introduce a private Member's Bill without success, the balancing difficulty of putting in what one wishes to get through and not overburdening the House with detail so that the time allowed is inadequate. I hope that it will be proved that the hon. Gentleman has judged it nicely and that we will get through the proceedings in Committee swiftly and without problems.

The badger-baiting clause has received most publicity, and it is extremely important. With my hon. Friends who have spoken today, I support the idea of cracking down on those appalling thugs who take pleasure in baiting, trapping, maiming, wounding and killing badgers, but I must join my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) in wondering about the wording of the clause. We must not do anything that will bring innocent people to the dock. I am thinking of people who might be walking their terrier, which then goes down a badger sett and kills a badger. That would not be a criminal act unless the man had been reckless in his approach to his dog's behaviour. We must distinguish between the innocent who inadvertently cause the death of a badgers and those who, using dogs, set out maliciously, and using many excuses to get round existing law, to kill badgers.

The hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) complained that, of the 29 badger setts in his area, all but two had disappeared. That is sad, but during the past 20 years the badger's real enemy has not been the badger baiter, the gamekeeper or the people who go out occasionally and kill badgers for one reason or another. His main enemy has been the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. We know of the apppalling way in which the badger has been hounded, killed and destroyed in the south-west of England as a result of what now appears to be a gross error in the assumption by the Ministry that the badger was the carrier of bovine tuberculosis. That is regrettable. It is not now reversible. As real doubt has been thrown on the belief that badgers carry tuberculosis, I hope that all such practices will cease and that badger setts will be reintroduced wherever possible so that those lovely animals can be put back into the countryside, thereby giving great pleasure to people, and be able to live the full lives that we would wish for them.

I agree with what has been said about mapping. There is no reason for mapping only moorland and heathland. Indeed, it is difficult to know what should be mapped and what should not. I welcome the prospect that all sites of special scientific interest should be mapped, to make it easier for people to enjoy them and to know what is being preserved.

I believe that it is right to make a change in the duty of the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister is beginning to take into account increasingly the environmental aspects of his job, and I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend will approach the problems outlined in the Bill with all the enthusiasm that Opposition Members and my hon. Friends and I would wish. However, it does no harm to underline his responsibility by laying a general duty upon him and his Ministry to ensure that the environment is properly protected. That is what the Bill seeks to do.

I think that the effect of the Bill will be largely dependent on the good will of the Minister of the day, because it can be interpreted very widely. I hope that, given the universal approval for the Bill that has been shown in the House today, Ministers, of whatever persuasion—and at whatever time in the future they may take control—will give due weight to the fact that the House has seen fit to pass such a measure.

I have a slight reservation about the provisions for marine nature conservation. Unlike Opposition Members, I feel that all controls of the environment should, if possible, be introduced voluntarily rather than compulsorily. My information from my hon. Friends in the Ministry is that they are not satisfied that the period of consultation and voluntary agreement has yet been exhausted, and that we may well reach the stage of being able to achieve marine conservation by agreement rather than by statute. If that can be done, I am sure that it will be a better approach to the problem.

With those few reservations, I warmly endorse the Bill and hope that it will have a swift and happy passage.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I rise briefly to give my wholehearted support to the Bill. I am very pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) has had the opportunity, through the private Members' ballot, to introduce it.

I should perhaps declare an interest, in that I have for many years been a co-opted member of the Council for National Parks. Its evidence to the Select Committee on the Environment and the support that it has given to my hon. Friend in preparing his Bill have been much valued by all of us. I speak also as someone with a firm belief in the need for us as a nation to conserve our national heritage, to cherish it and to ensure that our children can inherit it. We all too often forget that need in the rush for progress, either industrial or agricultural. We forget that aspects of our countryside, our landscape and our wildlife are under pressure and under threat, and we should all pay the greatest attention to their conservation.

The Bill is of great concern to my constituents who live in an inner city area of great dereliction. They face increasing pressures in the area and look to the countryside —and their ability to enjoy it—as an escape from the conditions in which they live. Therefore, the Bill is of concern not just to myself but to my constituents, and many of them have written to me to give their strong backing to my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields.

I hope that today's debate will continue to be non-partisan and non-party political, but I am deeply disappointed that the Government have not come forward with legislation in their own time to close the loopholes in the Wildlife and Countryside Act. The Government seem to be able to find time for many other matters. We have before us in a week's time a Bill which has only just been thought up by the Government on the amount of money that the GLC should pay to London Regional Transport. They can find time easily and readily for such legislation, and it is unfortunate that they have not been able to find time for this measure, which they themselves told the House on several occasions last year they were anxious to see carried forward.

The Bill does a number of major and valuable things. I shall not dwell too much on some aspecs of it, such as the desperate need to clarify the law relating to the horrible practice of badger digging and badger baiting, the need to close the loopholes in sections 28 and 29, which are widely acknowledged on both sides of the House and the mapping duties of the national park authorities, because it should be obvious that, in order to carry out the job of conservation of all aspects of landscape and wildlife in an area, a national park authority must have detailed information on the nature of the area under its protection, which is not provided by mapping just the areas of heath and moorland. All those are extremely welcome measures.

I want to concentrate on the particularly welcome provisions of clauses 4 and 6, which seek to place a duty on the Ministry of Agriculture and on the Forestry Commission, not just to have regard to the interests of conservation, but to further the interests of conservation. It is an extremely important push in the direction of conservation, which is much needed.

At the moment, the way in which the law is framed, and the way in which the Ministry of Agriculture all too often operates, is directed too much on the side of food production. Of course, as many hon. Members have said, there must be a sensible balance, but the balance at the moment is too far weighted on the side of food production against other considerations. Food production is not everything. Agricultural development is not everything. Other values have to be taken into account as well.

When we consider that we have lost about 20 per cent. of the wild moorland on Exmoor since the second world war because of the ploughing up of land for agricultural development, when we look at the way in which agricultural tracts are being bulldozed across the western side of the Cairngorm mountains, when we look at the great battle which was had, and the honourable role which was played, by the Secretary of State for the Environment over Halvergate marshes, when we look at the ploughing up of wild land which is still happening throughout Britain, we must be concerned at the way in which agricultural grants given by the Ministry are operating to encourage the process which is going on.

It is extremely important that we give the Ministry of Agriculture the duty to further the interests of conservation and set that duty alongside its duty to encourage the production of food for all of us. At the same time, I believe that that same duty needs to be placed on the shoulders of the Forestry Commission. If one looks at the way in which its grants operate, the tax incentives available for forestry production, its policies on the planting of broadleaved woodlands and the shape and siting of forest developments, and the way in which all too often the creation of forestry destroys the landscape rather than enhances it, as it can in the best circumstances, one sees that there is undeniably a need for the Forestry Commission also to have that duty to further conservation placed upon it.

The response by the Forestry Commission to some of the evidence which the Select Committee on the Environment received is instructive. I believe that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds rightly stated to the Committee that "in a variety of ways . . . the Commission has little regard for conservation."

The commission replied thus to that allegation from the RSPB:

"This is not so. As has already been explained, the Commission gives considerable weight to the needs of conservation and"—— this is the important point—

"is not inhibited by its remit in doing so."

That is not enough. The fact that the commission is not inhibited from paying heed to conservation is nowhere near enough. What my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields wishes to do in the Bill, and what I wish to do in supporting him strongly, is to place a duty on the commission to further conservation. We want, not just to remove inhibitions, but to place upon the commission a positive duty to further the interests of conservation.

There have been considerable improvements in the way in which the Ministry and the Forestry Commission have operated over the past 10 or 15 years, but those improvements have not yet gone far enough. The Bill will do a lot to push them further in that direction. The Bill will also give the House the opportunity—it is important that the House seizes it—to make an unequivocal statement that we, as the House of Commons, believe that environmental concern and protection of our natural heritage and environment are of overwhelming importance, and wish to see that heritage and environment improved by the passing of the Bill.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) because we are both members of the Select Committee on the Environment, which recently inquired into and reported on the effectiveness and operation of the Wildlife and Countryside Act. I should like to join hon. Members on both sides of the House in congratulating the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on introducing the measure. The House knows of the interest and expertise of the hon. Gentleman in matters environmental. Once again, he has done the House a great service in introducing the Bill. I am proud to be the Conservative sponsor of his measure and to be able to say a few words in support of it.

I wish the hon. Gentleman's Bill greater success than mine had. One of your predecessors, Mr. Deputy Speaker, refused to allow me to propose the closure of the motion when my debate on Second Reading had been going a full 45 minutes. That scuppered my measure and my opportunity of greatness. My Bill was 10th in that Session's list of private Members' Bills. I thought that, numerically, that showed the prospects for my ministerial career, but I have been sadly disabused of that notion since then. It led one of our national papers to report on my private Member's Bill, which was concerned with the discouragement of felling trees, with the succinct headline, "Trees Bill axed".

I am a member of the Select Committee. It might be prudent to mention my completely non-financial interests as an honorary member of the Landscape Institute, president of the Arboricultural Association and president of the London Green Belt Council.

I wish to concentrate on clause 4 of this important Bill. It is appalling to read the statistics of the dramatically changing nature of our countryside in recent years. In the past 35 years, over half our lowland heaths have been lost, half our fenlands have been drained, one third of our ancient woodlands have been felled, one quarter of our upland heaths and grasslands have been destroyed and one quarter of our hedgerows—over 150,000 miles—have been uprooted.

Anyone who has at heart the interests of sensible conservation of our countryside must be profoundly worried about the changing nature of our landscape. Yesteryear, nothing was allowed to stand in the way of maximum home food production. That was right in those days, but we must accept that times have changed and we are members of the European Community which has food surpluses such as butter and beef mountains and milk lakes. Many of our fields are being suffocated by the profusion of oilseed rape and other cereals. The message from both sides of the House is that care of the countryside should have at least as much consideration as the production of food.

I am perturbed that the Ministry of Agriculture is not responsible for collecting land use statistics. That is left to the Department of the Environment. Therefore, it is necessary to have the closest co-ordination and co-operation between the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture.

I welcome the recent establishment of the environment co-ordination unit in the Ministry and I hope that co-ordination between the Departments will be at ministerial as well as official level. Two of the principal recommendations of the Select Committee on the Environment tried to spur the Ministry of Agriculture into taking more interest in the care and conservation of the countryside.

Clause 2 has been unanimously welcomed by every environment organisation, the Government and the National Farmers Union. I pay tribute to the farmers who have become much more environmentally conscious in recent years. I hope that that trend continues.

If there is any doubt about the precedent for clause 2, I remind the House that the provisions are along the lines of well-established town and country planning legislation which gives power to the Secretary of State to issue, instantly and provisionally, preservation orders on listed buildings and trees.

I recognise the emotion involved in the protection of badgers, which is covered by clause 1. I believe that the existing legislation is not working and is being abused. The World Wildlife Fund backs up that contention.

I am not a lawyer, but I do not believe that clause 1 involves a great breach of legal principles. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) spoke about the introduction of the concept of recklessness. When I intervened in his speech, he agreed with me that section 25 of the Firearms Act 1968 contains a similar mechanism, as does clause 1 of the Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Bill which is going through the House. If it is a legal mechanism which should be used only as a last resort, I suggest that we have reached the last resort in our attempts to conserve the badger.

There is wide support for the Bill. The Council for the Protection of Rural England describes it as "an important step forward." The Nature Conservancy Council "support it, but it doesn't go far enough in one or two respects." The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds "warmly welcomes the Bill." The World Wildlife Fund describes its provisions as "necessary, bare minimum steps. . . all the clauses are entirely beneficial to the conservation of the British countryside." We have heard of the support, although anxieties have been expressed about the need for amendments to be made. We have also heard of the support of the Country Landowners Association and the National Farmers Union. I am also told that the Government have drafted two of the clauses.

I ask the House to give the measure a Second Reading. If we do not, I believe that we shall deserve the opprobium of the vast majority of the nation. If amendments are necessary, it is a matter surely of dotting the i's and crossing the t's of the Bill in Committee.

Dr. John Gilbert (Dudley, East): I join hon. Members on both sides of the House in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) not only on winning a place in the ballot but on submitting the Bill for our consideration.

I enter this debate with some diffidence, since most hon. Members who have contributed to it have far more expert knowledge in these matters than I do. But I want to echo the remark of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that people who live in urban centres of our country care passionately about these matters. Like him, I have had many letters on the subject of badgers, probably from people who have never been fortunate enough to see one. They care passionately that they be protected from some of the revolting practices about which we have heard. I give a great welcome to clause 1 on that account.

My only fear is whether clause 1 goes far enough. Although the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) is not in his place at the moment, I have to say that I found some of his words a little ominous. He said that we had to get the language right when we legislated for the control of and killing of badgers. No one can take exception to that sentiment, but then he added the words, of which I took careful note, "as long as no other country sport is affected." The direct implication of that is that this practice of digging out and killing badgers or subsequently using them in badger baiting is a form of country sport. It is no sport of any kind. It is a revolting practice engaged in by some of the most unspeakable elements in our society.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will accept, as I do, that that was not the intention of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and that the way that the hon. Gentleman has interpreted my hon. Friend's words was not what my hon. Friend wished to say or wanted the hon. Member for Dudley, East (Dr. Gilbert) to understand.

Dr. Gilbert: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is right, and I am happy to accept his interpretation of his hon. Friend's words. It may have been a slip of the tongue, but that is what the hon. Member for Dumfries said. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that this practice must be stopped, with all the powers and resources that the Government and the police can deploy.

Clause 3 relates to marine reserves. We do not yet have a marine reserve, and there is precious little sign of progress on our acquiring one. We are way behind many other countries in this respect. I understand the need for a balance between special interests and the need for conservation, but more than 60 other countries have already managed to strike that balance. It is quite wrong that we should be so far behind and falling further behind. Up to now, special interests appear to have had a veto. I welcome the reply given by the Under-Secretary of State on 9 January, when he said:

"I am concerned about the problems over making progress and am considering what more might be done." — [Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 476.]

That was said in the context of marine nature reserves. I very much hope that the Minister will say a little more today about the progress that he hopes to make.

Like some of my hon. Friends, I criticise the Bill not for what is in it but for what is not in it. I quite understand the difficulties of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields and the fact that he is anxious to pilot a Bill through the House that will encounter the minimum obstruction and controversy, but it is right to make it clear that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) said, we would wish to go much further than the Bill suggests. I should like to see an extension of planning control procedures to cover major agricultural operations. I know that, in paragraph 17, the Select Committee rejected that approach, but it seems nonsense that such a huge range of activities affecting the environment in which we live perhaps for all eternity should be exempt from public scrutiny and consent. That is quite wrong.

After all, if somebody puts up an offensive, ugly building in a city centre, it can be pulled down, but a lost marshland can never be replaced. It is gone for ever. Most farmers are responsible people, and the farming community understands no doubt that it holds its land in trust for the rest of the community, that it is not some asset to be exploited at whim. But until we introduce some system of planning consent for agriculture, we shall never make universal the principle of democratic community control of the environment.

Paragraph 33 of the Select Committee's report concludes by saying:

"The further measures we proposed would need a wider Bill than is currently acceptable and in the absence of Select Committee powers we expect the Government to introduce one in the next Session of Parliament".

I should be grateful if the Minister could say whether this Bill is the end of the road for this Parliament, or whether he and his colleagues are prepared to consider introducing legislation going further down that road before the end of this Parliament.

I am still very concerned about the general attitude displayed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I am quite prepared to give the Minister the benefit of the doubt, but I hope that he knows the impression that is created by his civil servants among responsible conservation groups. I have been given a selection of adjectives or epithets which come from conservation groups. They describe their impression of the Ministry's attitude. There are descriptions such as, "wholly unsympathetic to environmental issues", "devious", "hostile", "indifferent", "bored" and "ignorant". If I was a Minister and I knew that the civil servants in my Department were giving that impression to responsible conservation bodies, I should be very concerned.

The Government accept clause 4, which lays down the duty of Ministers of Agriculture to further conservation and protection of the countryside. That is extremely welcome. I trust that those Ministers will be energetic in drumming into the heads of their civil servants the fact that clause 4 must not become a dead letter and that the Department must henceforth deal with its new responsibilities for the protection of the countryside conscientiously, energetically and comprehensively.

It will not be easy to change entrenched attitudes. I am not making any political point. When I was at the Ministry of Defence and we were trying to do something about protecting the whale, we found equally entrenched attitudes then, under a Labour Government, and the Ministry of Agriculture was consistently and deviously obstructive in preventing anything being done in that regard.

If the Under-Secretary of State takes seriously his new responsibilities under clause 4—he has my every wish for success—he will make a far greater contribution to the cause of conservation than any other legislation, however beneficial, that can be passed by the House.

1.5 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on introducing the Bill. It is a splendid and necessary attempt not only to stiffen the Government's resolve to enhance the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 but to implement our constituents' desire to enhance the credibility of our conservation policy generally.

I endorse the point made by the right hon. Member for Dudley, East (Dr. Gilbert) about the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the difficulty faced by hon. Members over the Ministry's attitude to conservation. To date, the Ministry's behaviour towards the salmon conservation programme has been nothing short of shameful. The gassing in the so-called badger control programmes in various parts of the country has been absolutely disgraceful and has threatened the badger's survival—to no good effect.

This week, in The Field, the author of one article stated:

[Mr. Nicholas Soames]

"The Ministry of Agriculture admit that their trapping procedures are so slack in badger 'control' areas where there is TB in cattle that they have 'lost' no fewer than 108 caged traps, worth £35 each. Perhaps digging is not the only source of supply."

I hope that we shall pay more attention to that aspect as we consider the Bill further.

It has been said many times during the debate that no respectable person, and certainly no one who considers himself a sportman, can find badger baiting anything but utterly repugnant. There is no shadow of doubt that the hon. Member for South Shields has the support of the House for his proposal. We should find ways of tightening the definition of clause 1, and the hon. Member for South Shields is assured of my support for his efforts.

Other hon. Members have referred to the excellence of clause 2. It is high time such a measure was introduced, and I hope that there will now be an end to the rape of the sites which have been so appallingly handled.

I agree with the views expressed on clause 4. I accept the reservations of those who feel that one can go over the top in criticising the farming community. I agree with the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) that there has been an extraordinary reshaping of the countryside for the worse. I share the hon. Gentleman's views on how one feels when travelling around the countryside and seeing that the places that one remembers from a long time ago are now totally different. That is certainly a change for the worse.

In referring to clause 5, I make a point that is not entirely connected with the specifics of the clause, but I believe that the House should pay attention to it. I refer to national parks' policy and access to the countryside. I agree that it would be desirable to map all areas within national parks. The trouble is that we have stored up some dreadful folly in our approach to access to the countryside.

It is interesting to note that at a symposium on international conservation a learned gentleman said that "man wanted reserves for his benefit and the benefit of animals. When these reserves are created he wishes to visit them, but when he has visited them long enough there is nothing left to conserve. If we do not refrain from being over permissive, then we shall lose many more species."

The unhappy conclusion of that symposium was that more research was not the remedy, and that the immediate problem was the loss of breeding habitat for other human uses. The problem is socio-political and not biological. Although that is a little wide of the Bill, I am sure that the hon. Member for South Shields will agree that one of the major problems in the national parks is the way that people behave.

I have a letter from a friend of mine who has a property in a national park on the West Yorkshire moors. He refers to the countryside code, the first paragraph of which says:

"Enjoy the countryside. Respect its life and work."

He had two beautiful memorials on his property. One has recently been stolen, and the other has been grossly vandalised. He said:

"Egg stealing has increased alarmingly, decimating stocks of merlins and raptores. Rustling has greatly increased. Poaching has increased on a scale that is unprecedented."

The litter that is left on the national parks' famous walks and other places is a deplorable blot on the countryside. I hope that the hon. Gentleman can incorporate some further tightening up of such matters. I hope, too, that the Government will support the Bill. The House and the country will be grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his initiative and courage in bringing forward the Bill.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): There is no doubt that the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 was a major step forward. It was the first comprehensive attempt to legislate specifically for the protection of wildlife habitats. The Act has been instrumental in stimulating the public into giving greater consideration to conservation.

Having lived with that Act for the past three years, we have found it wanting in certain respects. A number of loopholes have allowed unscrupulous persons to dig up badgers, shoot protected birds and either destroy sites of special scientific interest or hold the Nature Conservancy Council to ransom for large compensation payments for doing nothing. It must be right to make changes to give a holding period after the preliminary notification papers are sent to the landowner, during which time nothing may be done to destroy the scientific interest and that which is worthy of conservation.

I shall give one example of how the Bill may help in Oxfordshire. People there have been fighting for the safety of one of Oxfordshire's sites of special scientific interest in the present three-month loophole period at Lashford lane fen at Dry Sandford. That site of some 17 acres was owned by the Thames water authority, which divided it into two lots and put it up for sale.

The Berkshire, Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire naturalists trust tendered for 15 acres at £1,000 per acre. Its tender was accepted, but the authority had divided the site so that lot one, of just two acres, included all the road frontage, and a property speculator tendered some £25,000 for it. That was accepted by the authority. At the same time, the potential buyer was advertising part of the lot as 12 one-seventh-of-an-acre plots with no planning permission, for £5,000 each. That is a return of some £60,000 on his £25,000 investment. That site of special scientific interest could be bought by 12 people. They could do nothing with it.

Fortunately, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security and others took that matter up with the Department of the Environment. They pointed out that the water authority had a statutory duty to further conservation and under that pressure the property speculator withdrew. We now await the water authority's decision on the fate of lot one. The tender made by the Berkshire, Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire naturalists trust still stands, but if the SSSI notification had been immediate, none of this need have happened.

I am sure that everyone who is interested in the welfare of the countryside will welcome the tightening up of the law on SSSIs. This change will protect areas of particular scientific interest, but one has also to have regard to the wider countryside. Good conservation will always need a system of consent by all those who have the trust of the land, and it should be emphasised that many farmers believe in the same objectives as good conservationists. Many farmers in north Oxfordshire are excellent conservationists. New hedges are being laid and over 2,000 new trees have been planted in the past four years in Oxfordshire alone. There is a climate of change in the farming world. Many farmers are keen to work with conservationists to help protect the countryside and our rural heritage. Conservation based on co-operation is the way forward.

The badger is the emblem of the Berkshire, Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire naturalists trust, of which I and many others are proud to be members. I recognise that the deplorable practice of badger baiting still exists and I, and I am sure every hon. Member, wish to see an end to such practices. I hope that it will be possible to tighten up the wording of the clause even further to ensure that we can help stamp out badger baiting. Above all, this Bill will help to stimulate consent, co-operation and conservation.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Mr. Deputy Speaker has made an appeal for brevity, so I shall keep my remarks as short as possible.

The House should wholeheartedly welcome if not the letter, the spirit of the Bill, particularly the clause that aims to protect badgers. In my county of Derbyshire, organised gangs of badger sett diggers are at work. The vice-chairman of the Derbyshire naturalists trust, Mr. John Varty, recently stated that setts were being dug out at the rate of one a week, and that that could be just the tip of the iceberg. Therefore, I was rather surprised to hear the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr). He said that in the adjoining county of Leicestershire, there has been no problem with badger baiting. He based his conclusion on a letter, which he read to the House, that he had received from the chief constable of Leicestershire. The letter said that in the past 12 months there had been only one court case in Leicestershire concerning badger baiting.

Therefore, my hon. Friend concluded that there was no problem. I am sorry that he is not in his place, because I point out, with the greatest respect, that he should have inquired how many instances there have been of complaints to the police, on which the police have taken no action. I thought that the letter from the chief constable smacked somewhat of complacency when it went on to say, if I heard my hon. Friend correctly, that police officers who did not know about the Badgers Act may have advised a civil action. It is a disgrace if such things are taking place.

The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Hoyle) referred to the recent case brought by the Derbyshire naturalists trust and correctly said that private citizens can, if they so wish, bring actions in the courts for the offence of badger baiting. However, he did not say that in that case the trust was only partly successful. The charge of digging for a badger was quashed, although the other charge of attempting to take a badger was upheld. More important for those who are concerned about badgers, the trust's costs were estimated to be a little less than £2,000. The judge in the case ordered the defendants to contribute £500 towards those costs. It is not on to expect private citizens who are concerned about this disgusting practice of badger baiting to dig into their own pockets to the tune of £1,500 if they wish to see justice done.

The police are perhaps reluctant to prosecute if they are concerned about the evidence, but there is a case for saying that the law is totally inadequate in this respect and that steps should be taken to tighten it up. Those who dig up these setts are not novices. They are well organised and ruthless people. These countryside muggers, if I may so describe them, very often get away with what they do. The House has a duty to take action to stop this practice.

A large number of badgers have been killed and tormented during the past 10 years. Quite apart from the badgers that are dug out of their setts by the people to whom I have referred, I understand that approximately 20,000 badgers have been killed at the direction of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, although only a few of them were suffering from tuberculosis. Therefore, I hope that in future the Ministry will act in a more enlightened way. The badger needs to be protected. It would be a disgrace if the House failed to take action today.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on introducing the Bill. I do so on behalf of the half million people who live either in the Lake District or in the surrounding district, which includes a large part of my constituency. I have perhaps the most beautiful constituency in Britain. It includes a number of lakes—Bassenthwaite, Derwentwater, Thirlmere, Loweswater. The people who live in that area are grateful to my hon. Friend for introducing the Bill. Many newspaper columns in Cumbria have beem filled with correspondence relating to the efforts of my hon. Friend.

I wish to say a few words about what I believe to be one of the most significant clauses in the Bill—clause 4 which puts into context the whole of the environmental debate. It tries to establish a balance between the development of the environment, the pursuit of economic growth and conservation. In his article in last Sunday's edition of The Sunday Times Mr. David Bellamy misunderstood this approach. I should like to take this opportunity to correct what he said in his article. Clearly, he does not understand what is happening today in our political institutions.

The article is entitled "The Green Rustling" and was written by David Bellamy and Brendan Quayle. It says:

> "Though we, too, have our green spokesmen, our political parties and the ranks of elected representatives have shown themselves less than sensitive to the environment."

Mr. Bellamy is completely wrong. During the last two years, there has been a transformation in the attitude of the Conservative Government towards nuclear waste. A decision has been taken by British Nuclear Fuels, in conjunction with the Department of Energy, to spend £150 million upon reducing the discharges from the Sellafield plant into the Irish sea. That is a large sum of money. Controversy surrounds the spending of such large sums of money, but that money is to be spent upon the basis that on this occasion the environmental lobby has been proved to be absolutely right. It has maintained that money must be spent upon safeguarding the environment. For Mr. Bellamy to state that we are insensitive to these issues means that he does not understand what is happening and, furthermore, does not follow the debates in this country on green issues.

The fact is that the Government do not intend to resist the changes that we are seeking to make to the legislation relating to sites of special scientific interest. Three years ago, a major row took place in the House when the Government refused to accept that voluntary arrangements could not be relied upon. There has been a transformation in the Government's attitude. They accept that the voluntary system has not worked.

I believe that both the Government and Opposition parties accept that there are responsibilities over and above the use of public resources for industrial regeneration and development and that we must ensure that a proportion of those resources are devoted to securing the protection of the environment. It is most unfair for people who are well respected outside the House to use the columns of major newspapers to misrepresent the position in the House.

I do not say that what has been achieved so far is sufficient. We are at the beginning of a period of decades when vast public resources will be expended on improving the environment. For example, the Government have not yet given way on acid rain, but in 10 years they will not only have given way but have implemented major schemes to reduce acid rain as the European Commission suggests. We must not assume that because there is resistance today that is the final position. All these arguments are steadily being won and Ministers know it. At a dinner with the Norwegians the other day, the chap from the CEGB was embarrassed by questions about the CEGB's response on acid rain, but he knew in his heart that it would eventually be forced to give way and was merely waiting for the Government to budge or be compelled to budge.

My hon. Friend's Bill is just part of a major shift taking place in British politics. The politics of the 1940s, the 1950s, the 1960s and to some extent the 1970s pursued growth at almost any cost. That is now coming to an end and we are moving into a period in which people are far more committed to the environment and understand that whenever we spend money on the development of our economy or society we must ensure that adequate protection is provided for the areas that others will inherit and which we have a duty to preserve.

1.26 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): It is always a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), as he never speaks to a party brief. He says what he believes, which is sometimes uncomfortable for the Government and no doubt sometimes uncomfortable for his own party. He reminds us, however, that some issues are broadly above partisan politics, and this is one of them. I am grateful for his comments about the action on Sellafield, about which we have had many discussions. I, too, felt that Mr. Bellamy's article was a little unfair, not just to the Government, but to others in the House. He might at least have been gracious enough to mention that the Department makes a considerable grant to the organisation with which he is associated. I doubt whether that would have been so 10 years ago. I was therefore grateful for the remarks of the hon. Member for Workington, who raised the standard of a very good debate even higher.

I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on his good luck, but also on the way in which he has set about making his reforms. He has been in close discussion with officials at the Department, to whom he paid a generous tribute. I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) who started the ball rolling on the three-month loophole. Had we been able to get through the drafting complexities, which he acknowledged was not achieved in his Bill, we might have been able to act more quickly. The hon. Member for South Shields, however, will confirm that it has required a very complex process of drafting and redrafting, with his help and that of officials at the Department, to close the section 28 and section 29 loopholes.

It is always tempting in Friday debates, when everyone speaks with a little less partisanship, and perhaps with less reliance then normal on prepared briefs, to speak a little more like a Back-Bench Member. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, whom I genuinely welcome to the debate, will forgive me if I make some remarks about his responsibilities.

I wish to follow the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). During the 50 years in which my father has been a farmer, he has seen the cycles to which my hon. Friend referred. He remembers the time when the leader of my party, Mr. Chamberlain, said that it would be the midsummer of madness to support agriculture in Britain when there were food surpluses in the world. The Minister of Agriculture at that time was later a Speaker of the House, Mr. Speaker Morrison. British agriculture was consigned to dereliction and to bankruptcy, which was not good for conservation. It was certainly not good for the rural economy or for the British people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster made the good point that it is necessary to use the politics of rhetoric to move the great ship of state and old policy-making procedures in one direction, but we must remember that once the movement has started it can sometimes be carried too far. I must declare an interest here. As I said, my family is involved in farming, and I have discovered plain bewilderment in the farming communities. This is similar to what happened with the nuclear industry. Ten years ago farmers were public heroes—the industry was doing all that was asked of it, including increasing food production, it had massive bipartisan support, started by the Labour party's 1947 Act and supported by my party, and it was built into the foundation of the European Community—but then, all of a sudden, they were told that not only were they not the most successful producers, doing what was asked of them, but they were regarded almost as public enemies. That is not the way to treat people.

I hope that no hon. Member doubts my commitment to the protection of the environment, and I do not doubt the commitment of the hon. Member for South Shields. I say this because it is easier for me to say it than it would be for my hon. Friend the Minister. We must remember that farmers followed the leadership of the House and did what was asked of them; now they are told that they did the wrong thing. Times have changed, and we need a change of strategy, but we must also remember the stresses and strains that can be involved. If pressure groups were to say about other industries some of the things that are said about farmers, I am sure that there would be protests from the Opposition.

Recently, the European Community introduced a minor piece of Community legislation on the recycling of tin cans —not a bad idea, one may think. Not one, but two, former leaders of the Labour party, and not just the Welsh TUC, but the Welsh CBI, have told me that it will mean the destruction of the tinplate industry as we know it. That may be right, and we must take into account their views, because employment is vital, but let us remember that the farming industry must be shown what it is that we want. If we can show clearly what we want, from everything that we have learnt in the past, it will do it. No industry is better at doing that.

Having departed from my brief and trundled over the territory of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, may I now defend his Department? Those who do not wish to attack farmers usually vent their spleens by attacking my hon. Friend and other Ministers with responsibility for agriculture, which is not fair. For example, the hon. Member for South Shields, who paid tribute to the movement that has occurred, talked about the destruction that can be wrought by the misuse of capital grants. I mentioned that in my evidence to the Select Committee. I would be the first to say that since my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture and my hon. Friend the Minister of State have been responsible for such matters, there has been a complete reorientation of the approach to capital grants.

The Ministers at the Ministry of Agriculture now talk of the conservation impact of grants as one of the principal criteria which they use in sorting out their grant regime. Within a very short space of time there has been a shift in policy from having grants available for the removal of hedgerows to grants for the planting of hedgerows. That is a symbol of the way in which things are changing very much for the better.

There have been many admirable speeches in the debate. I think I can say, without fear of being accused of flattery, that there has not been a bad speech in the debate.

Mr. Ron Davies: Will the Minister accept from me that at least one hon. Member welcomes the fact that a spokesman from the Department of the Environment is now trampling on the ground of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food? It is a welcome initiative. Some of us have argued for a considerable time that there should be a greater degree of co-operation between the two Departments.

There seems to be a general recognition of the difficulties facing agriculture and that the Ministry is pursuing policies which are not always in the best interests of the environment. There seems also to be a general recognition that the Department of the Environment has shifted its attitude, particularly over the past two years, and is now genuinely anxious to pursue conservation measures, but there has been no sign of positive co-operation between the two Departments. There has not been a statement of Government policy to resolve the conflict between them. Will the Minister consider whether some new initiatives can be developed so that there can be a concerted approach to the problems, instead of the two Departments working separately?

Mr. Waldegrave: My response is that only in the past week we have published the details of an interesting joint programme between my Department and the Ministry of Agriculture. We have seen the establishment of an exciting new scheme for the management of the Broads. It will be financed jointly by our two Departments and by the Countryside Commission and the Broads Authority. It is not only a symbol but an example of practical work on the ground, showing how the Departments work together. That exciting proposal came from a joint working group of the two Departments with the Countryside Commission.

I was grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) for his remarks about the Broads. Indeed, I feel rather guilty in regard to the hon. Gentleman. When he was engaging in some routine Government bashing at Question Time recently, I let a touch of irony creep into my tribute to his expertise in these matters. We know that his expertise is real, because he has had a long involvement with the national parks movement.

It is often difficult for campaigning groups to notice when they are beginning to win their cause. As people who are more interested in the outcome than in the rhetoric, they should try to recognise when and where they are winning. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) has a saying that all political careers end in failure, in the sense that if politicians achieve what they set out to achieve, no one has any further interest in them. There is some truth in that. We must not forget the progress that is being made in environmental matters. We must not put it under our belt as if it were nothing. A completely new approach to the issues has been put forward by the two Departments concerned and it is widely welcomed in the House.

The purpose of the Bill is to close a loophole; that is at the heart of it. I am able to reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), who told me that he would be unable to be present for my reply to the debate because of an important engagement elsewhere. He doubted whether we had closed the section 29 loophole. The fact that I use the word "we" shows the amount of co-operation that there has been on the Bill. There is no doubt that the hon. Member for South Shields has closed the section 28 loophole. I think that he has also closed the section 29 loophole.

By extending the period to four months, if the NCC were to feel at the end of three months that it needed a nature conservation order to produce the effect of a stop power, it could get into action and start to prepare for one. It could do that easily in under a month. It usually takes two or three weeks, although it has been done more quickly on some occasions. Therefore, that is not a serious worry. It does not worry the NCC. In a note that it circulated before the Bill it accepted that "there are advantages in building the additional month's protection into the framework of section 28 rather introducing a completely new stop power exercise separately by the NCC."

Therefore, it supports that part of the Bill. I think that that is all right. We must look at the matter closely in Committee, assuming that the House gives the Bill a Second Reading today.

Nor need my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green worry about the danger of manipulation. He seemed to think that if he was clever enough a farmer could manipulate the reformed procedures in such a way that the NCC would have only a month in which to act. Under the proposals of the hon. Member for South Shields, there is a minimum of four months' protection following notice of a potentially damaging operation. Therefore, I think that the Bill as drafted is all right. We must go over it carefully in Committee, but the hon. Gentleman is on the right lines and we certainly welcome what he has done in that area.

We also welcome the aim of clause 1. The digging and baiting of badgers is utterly repulsive and the Government are anxious that those who attempt to do so should be caught and punished. The present law, as has been said, has not been wholly ineffective. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) gave the 1983 figures. There were 57 prosecutions and 50 convictions, and that is a high rate. There were prosecutions in 1984, and again the figures were given. The Government accept that the law could be and should be improved, and we must consider whether clause 1 has been correctly drafted. We shall look at that in Committee. We certainly welcome the principle of taking further steps to stamp out this repulsive activity and we shall give all the help that we can to the hon. Member for South Shields in Committee to see that we achieve what we want.

The worries of those who have the interests of legitimate field sports at heart have been put forward, and the boundaries must be carefully drawn in this matter. I have mentioned the acceptance of clause 2 and the blocking of the loopholes. Of course, there has been damage. In one or two cases we have been able to use the nature conservation order procedure to limit damage in the past few months, but that is not really what the procedure was meant for. It would be better to close the loophole, and we welcome the proposals of the hon. Member for South Shields.

It has not been referred to in the debate, but it is worth putting on record that the NCC has powers available to it to deal with any of the doubts which were expressed at some stages by farmers about conservation aspects. The fact that that has not been raised in the debate is evidence of the diplomatic skills of the hon. Member for South Shields, who has successfully quieted any of the fears that might have been expressed by the NFU. However, it might be worth while to put on record the situation.

It is possible for a farmer to undertake work which is then found to be a potentially damaging operation when the SSSI is notified. He would, under the clause, have to cease such work while discussion took place with the NCC. Should the NCC decide that the operation should not proceed, the farmer might have incurred some costs. In such a case the NCC would offer compensation, provided there was satisfactory proof that financial loss was incurred under the terms of the management agreement. That is in accordance with the existing financial guidelines. Therefore, the powers exist to deal with that potential unfairness. If anybody is worried about that, I think that his worries are groundless.

Mr. Simon Hughes: There is also an argument, which I hope the Minister and the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) accept, that the NCC is under resourced in terms of the number of people, particularly in the regions, to do the policing work. Where there is not an equally valid argument about costs, there is an argument for greater resources so that the operation can be carried out as intended.

Mr. Waldegrave: I know that it is the role of Opposition parties always to act like Oliver Twist and ask for more, but there can be few programmes in this financial year which have had more privileged treatment than that of the NCC, which has had an additional £7 million. A member of the council is present, and I believe I am right in saying that more money would not be effectively useable by the NCC within the year for the deployment of trained people. Therefore, we have taken steps to put our money where our mouth is and make the resources available. I assure the hon. Gentleman that in the present climate that is not the easiest of tricks to pull. Therefore, perhaps it is fair to say that we have not done too badly in relation to the NCC and its resources in the past year.

I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for South Shields in introducing his proposals for marine nature reserves. Many hon. Members referred to the unsatisfactory outcome so far of the search for marine nature reserves. In my evidence to the Select Committee I freely accepted that the original intention of the Act had not yet come about, and we must look at it carefully. We must ask ourselves whether that is a result of inherent weaknesses in the Act, or whether there are other reasons——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: When will we get them?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is waiting with impatience. I hope that I can encourage him. "When will we get them?" is the question that we must ask ourselves. Is the delay in getting them a result of weaknesses in the Act, or is there some other reason?

We accept that progress has been disappointing. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green who is the Chairman of the Select Committee, said that there were three choices — I think that three were discussed by the Select Committee. The hon. Member for South Shields picked one of them. The hon. Gentleman is proposing to extend quite considerably the area of compulsion in the Act. What he said was echoed by his sponsors and by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman). He referred to the consensus behind the Bill. It is very good that the hon. Gentleman has achieved such consensus on the principal agricultural aspects of the Bill. However, there is no consensus on the part of the Bill concerning marine nature reserves. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman has had discussions with the fisheries interests. We must discuss the matter in Committee, but unless the hon. Gentleman can tell us that we have the agreement of the fisheries interests, we must recognise that in that respect we are advancing in an area in which there is not the same consensus. Therefore, we need to consider the matter carefully.

I have had long discussions with the NCC about the marine nature reserve problem. Initially, when I arrived in my Department, the line that the NCC was taking was that its principal duty and the direction of its resources was towards the SSSI renotification programme. That was its first priority. It wanted a little more time to see whether it was possible to negotiate, through the undoubtedly complex procedures in the Act, for marine nature reserves. The NCC is beginning to get impatient. We are all beginning to get impatient. I am not quite convinced of this, but we have to judge whether we should go straight into an extension of compulsion at this stage. We must look at the evidence and discuss the differing views in Committee. We must recognise that on this matter there are sharply differing views, whereas there are not about some other parts of the Bill; above all, about sections 28 and 29 of the Act.

Perhaps this answers the cry of "How long, O Lord, how long?" I am pleased to tell the House that there have been some encouraging developments in the last few days. At Skomer, off south Wales, constructive and helpful discussions have taken place with the sea fisheries committee and local fishermen. I understand that there is broad agreement in principle on the NCC's objectives and that the one major point of difference is to be resolved by controlled scientific tests to be carried out in the spring. Against that background, I am worried that a move towards further compulsion might be counter-productive.

If we are on the verge of getting the first agreement, it would be a pity to say that the Act had failed at the very moment when it might be about to produce a success. I am not committing myself. When we were looking at the Broads last year and I was cross-examined by the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie), I learnt not to make promises which cannot be fulfilled. I do not say that the Skomer deal is sewn up, but we are making progress, and it seems that some of the fears about impossibility may be exaggerated. Let us wait a while.

The hon. Member for South Shields is changing the nature of marine reserves and is trying to create a sort of marine SSSI. Powerful arguments were put against such a move in the debates on the 1981 legislation. It was pointed out that difficult problems would be involved.

I have asked my officials to work urgently with the Ministry of Agriculture, the NCC and other interested parties to find a way of preserving the voluntary basis that is the major success of the 1981 Act. Indeed, the Select Committee has endorsed that voluntary approach as the major success of the Act, and the Government welcome that endorsement. Select Committees often like to get major reforming programmes under their belt, and it is a great tribute to those who did so much work on the 1981 Act that their approach should have been endorsed by a Select Committee three years later. I hope that the same will be true of marine nature reserves.

The Bill would impose a duty on the Ministry of Agriculture to further conservation where that was consistent with the Ministry's other duties. I hope that I and my colleagues at the Ministry of Agriculture have shown that we understand whence that demand derives. There have been worries about the Ministry's commitment to the environment, but I hope that what I have said has persuaded hon. Members that things have changed.

The Bill could set a dangerous precedent. I am not sure why there should be more of a duty on the Ministry of Agriculture to pay attention to conservation than there is on my Department to pay attention to the legitimate needs of agriculture and industry. We should do that in all our planning and other aspects.

We write into some Acts a duty on Departments to take various actions. Section 11 of the Countryside Act 1968 states:

> "In the exercise of their functions relating to land under any enactment every Minister, government department and public body shall have regard to the desirability of conserving the natural beauty and amenity of the countryside."

We shall doubtless return to that issue in Committee if the Bill is given a Second Reading, but I am sceptical about expressing the anxieties and fears of the House in the form of statutory duties on Departments. It would be a good parlour game to invent the statutory duties that should be laid on each Department. I imagine that the Treasury would have a long list of duties laid upon it. I hope that, in considering the budget of my Department, the Treasury will have the interests of conservation more at heart than the interests of other Departments against which I might be competing for resources. I think that there is a certain danger here in allowing a perfectly understandable wish for a declaration to carry us into some logical absurdity in the way that we look at Government Departments.

In another clause, the Bill proposes to extend the scope of the maps which national park authorities are required to prepare under section 43 of the 1981 Act to include areas in addition to moor and heath. This has been welcomed by a number of hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) pointed out the difficulties that face those in national parks who are involved in this difficult business of trying to balance access and conservation all the time. It is a hard task, but not an impossible one, as the success of the national parks movement shows. It needs work, care, intelligence and resources, but it is not an impossible task.

I am a great supporter of the national park authorities. There is clearly a growing body of opinion in favour of broadening the range of section 43 in some way. However, we have to recognise that many people who live and work in the areas of national parks are concerned about the proposals and about that use to which the maps would be put and how their livelihoods and freedom of action would be affected. The proposal will need to be considered further in Committee, and I am sure that it will be.

At first sight the hon. Gentleman's proposal to extend the duty to further conservation to the Forestry Commission seems to land us in fewer problems than extending duties round the central Departments of Whitehall. We have such a duty laid on the water authorities, as several hon. Members have pointed out. In a functional Department, I can see the logical argument more clearly for saying that in carrying out this defined function we are required to pay particular attention to another aspect of policy, whereas for central Government Departments it is the collective responsibility of Ministers together to see that the policy is right.

We ought to give the Forestry Commission due credit for the initiatives that it has taken. In the last few years there has been a great deal more sensitivity to the concerns. I have seen in the constituency of the hon. Member for Workington how the commission tries to take care, for example, to contour new plantations and not to have those terrible straight lines of trees marching across the hills, which many of us regret and feel desecrate the countryside. There has been progress, and my impression is that the commission's awareness of the needs of conservation is much sharper than some of its critics suggest, and is improving. I am sure that there is room for further improvement, and I am well aware of the cases where there has been conflict between conservation and forestry in the past year or two. There are still cases where that conflict can be quite sharp. Although we have to put some doubts on the record, we can return to that matter in Committee and see what the balance of the arguments is.

Mr. Soames: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in view of the very serious damage that has been done by afforestation, especially in the north, we should try to adopt the policy that, where conservation and forestry clash, the interests of conservation should always overwhelm those of forestry?

Mr. Waldegrave: I hope that in many cases the spirit of compromise and consensus which has been called upon today can show ways forward where it does not have to be total victory for one side or the other. There have been some conservation gains from afforestation. It is not all loss. As usual, there is a balance to be struck.

I have not referred to all the speeches in the debate. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) spoke of the new dangers that derive from our technological capacity to do more than in the past, and that is true. My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), who is one of our leading lights on this subject, encapsulated a lot of the present-day understanding of the need for balance between good farming and good conservation. I pay tribute to him for that.

Dr. Gilbert: I realise the difficulty of the hon. Gentleman in trying to deal with all the matters raised in the debate, but may I invite him to answer my question? Does he consider that the Bill is the end of the road for conservation in this Parliament, or does he contemplate his Department introducing any further legislation in the life of the present Parliament?

Mr. Waldegrave: As a senior Minister in a former Government, the right hon. Gentleman will doubtless remember the procedures whereby legislative time is shared out. My Department certainly does not rule out going back to the powers that be and asking for further amendments in due course. I certainly do not rule that out.

I apologise to those whom I have not mentioned. The Government broadly welcome the Bill, despite their reservations, which I have already put on record, particularly about the duty on the Minister of Agriculture and about the marine nature reserves. I think that a record number of amendments for any Bill in the history of the House were tabled to the original Bill, and that shows that there is a need for a certain self-discipline, which, indeed, the hon. Member for South Shields has shown. Some of my hon. Friends may be thinking of tabling amendments on wider matters than are dealt with in the Bill, but, in the interests of enacting the principal clauses which we all want, perhaps they will consider refraining this time. However, they will of course make their own decisions about that.

The Government broadly welcome the Bill. We certainly welcome the closing of the loopholes. There are some problems with some of the other clauses, but such matters can be discussed in Committee in a constructive spirit.

2 pm

Dr. David Clark: With the leave of the House, I shall respond briefly to some of the points raised. I very much enjoyed all the contributions, and I was encouraged that the overwhelming majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House supported almost every clause. I know that the Minister was present for almost all the debate, and he will have heard most of his hon. Friends supporting every clause.

I should stress that this is a minimum Bill. The Government's job has been done for them. All the interested bodies have put in hundreds of man hours to obtain a consensus Bill. Therefore, I was a little disappointed that the Minister should say that he would accept one provision involving the closure of the sites of special scientific interest, that the Government would look favourably on the badger clause and that they might possibly consider the Forestry Commission provisions, although there could be difficulties. But I cannot see any difficulties there. Under section 48 of the original Act, the water authorities were empowered to undertake exactly the same responsibilities, so there is no case for saying that the Forestry Commission should not be included.

I turn to the marine nature reserves. The World Wildlife Fund was responsible for drawing up the provision, and the NCC gave its clearance and approval. As I have already said twice, the provision has the full support of the Nature Conservancy Council.

The Minister and I perhaps disagree most about clause 4. Incidentally, I echo the Minister's sentiments, and I hope that hon. Members will not try to wreck the Bill. For example, the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Munro) suggested that he might want to table an amendment to change the birds in various schedules. But under section 22 of the 1981 Act there is no need for that, because the Secretary of State can simply lay an order under that Act, and birds and other animals can be deleted or added to the schedules. That is the way to proceed, and it would not be in order to include such an amendment in the Bill. I hope that the hon. Member for Dumfries will not pursue that point.

I was surprised to hear the Minister's statement about agriculture. He was talking about agricultural technology and techniques, and said that they were the engine of destruction for the countryside. Those words graphically describe the situation. As the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) clearly said, there is a general feeling throughout the country that agriculture is concerned not only with producing food in a very tightly knit country but with preserving the environment. Farmers realise that. The mushrooming of the wildlife advisory groups has proved the point. The NFU has supported the clause. The Country Landowners Association has specifically said that it welcomes the measure.

I ask the Under-Secretary of State to listen to hon. Members and the voices of people outside and to nudge his colleague the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food — I know that the right hon. Gentleman has listened to the debate and I am aware of his interest in it —into taking this legislation on board. It will buy a lot of good will and will help the farming community and the cause of conservation.

I thank hon. Members for listening to the debate and for contributing to it. I hope that they are prepared to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

Education (School Budgets) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.5 pm

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This is a small Bill but, if it becomes law, it will bring about a vital improvement in the growing debate on education spending and the relationship between spending, falling school rolls, equipment and general school provision. Clauses 1 and 2 are at the heart of the Bill and, in view of the time, my remarks will be basically directed towards those clauses.

Clause 1 refers to the publication of certain financial information. The problem of school closures is an issue that has raged fiercely around the country. When a school closure is proposed, ratepayers, and especially parents and friends of the school, feverishly try to find out from the local education authority the actual cost of running the school. So often parents are told that a school must close because "it costs the authority too much" or "the authority thinks that it could make better use of the money saved." How much money is saved from a school closure? How much better will that money be used?

If the Bill becomes law, the level of debate will immediately be raised and parents and friends of schools where closures are threatened will be greatly helped, especially in dealing with the growing problem of whether small village schools should or should not be closed. The closure of those schools, especially in the shire counties, generates as much heat as any other matter.

Unfortunately, at the moment there is a dispute between the local education authorities and the teachers over salaries. I do not want to be drawn down that path, save only to say what would happen if parents and the people interested in schools knew the actual salaries paid per school. First, the necessary extra financial information would be provided. Secondly, if information came out school by school on the balance between how much is spent on teachers' salaries and how much is spent on equipment, those who are interested in the education system would benefit.

Clause 1 covers the salaries not only of teachers but of those who cook meals, clean and maintain. The total salary bill will be available for parents to see.

I refer to capitation allowances and where the money goes. Parents in some areas rightly complain about the shortage of stationery and about the amount spent on books and equipment generally. Information sometimes comes from a local education authority that a large sum of money has been spent on a computer and that there is no money left for books, stationery and other things. That information is critically important to parents. They want to know where money is going and whether it is going on large items of equipment.

Other Departments are involved. It is not just the local education authorities and the Department of Education and Science that pour money into schools. The Department of Trade and Industry and the Manpower Services Commission are indirectly pushing money into the education system. We need to know who is contributing what. There are three tributaries of money going into schools — DES-LEA, DTI and MSC. It is vital that parents should know who is paying what.

If the figures were presented in the way that I envisage in the Bill, councillors would be able to see how costs varied from school to school and that would help them. It is plainly not possible for councillors to visit all schools in a large shire county. I wish that they could. If the Bill became law they would be able to compare schools within an authority's area and schools in other areas.

There is an interesting article in today's Times Educational Supplement, talking about the ups and downs of local education authority spending. The article makes the significant point:

> "Whether there has been any widening of the gap between the 'top' and 'bottom' authorities is not clear."

The authors mean the top and bottom spending authorities. The article continues:

> "But it is apparent that local autonomy has been exercised to the extent of radically different behaviour between 1979 and 1980."

In other words, in the past five years there has been a variation in the way that local education authorities have spent money. It would be beneficial for local education authorities and those interested in education to see who is spending what, authority by authority. The Bill refers to church and voluntary-aided schools, and information relating to them would also be helpful.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): On the subject of capitation allowances—I am not asking the hon. Gentleman to answer this point; it is for the record—I visited some schools in Surrey recently with the Select Committee. The capitation allowance for some schools is of course fixed. The parents in those schools double the capitation allowance. That could not possibly happen in an area of unemployment and in down-town schools as it happens in Surrey schools. It is as well to be aware of that reality at the moment.

Mr. Madel: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I remember that we used to talk about that in the previous Select Committee. I was coming to the point about allowances and whether schools received money from outside. To present the figures in the way I seek would not just be helpful to councillors; it would help parents who were trying to convince their authorities that their school was falling to pieces.

The Bill would require local education authorities to show what was being spent on equipment and maintenance year by year. Parents often argue strongly that a school needs more money spent on maintenance, yet are never fully told what the figures are or how much has been spent in the previous five to 10 years. It would help authorities more easily to identify where money will have to be spent on maintenance in the following three to four years.

It would be helpful to parents to be able to say to the local education authority, "Seven years ago you spent this on that school. What are your plans? When will you have to spend more money there?" It can only be a good thing for parents and potential parents to know what has been and what will be spent on schools. It would encourage more financial help from local businesses and donors if they could see what others had given in the past and what was needed for the school. I am convinced that, if more financial information were available and the local education authority genuinely could not do what was necessary for equipment or maintenance, the school might find help from outsiders and those interested in the school —firms, local businesses and individual or groups of donors.

[Mr. Madel]

Clause 3 would merely make it administratively easier for the local education authorities and those involved to publish this information. I have suggested that it is done in a manner similar to that set out in the Education Act 1981 and the Education (School Information) Regulations 1981.

Clause 4(2) refers to the timing of getting this information. The information does not have to be published before the first day of the autumn term of the school in 1985. In other words, the first time that this information would be available to parents, if the Bill should become law, would be in the autumn of 1986. Those elected in May in the shire counties local elections would have had almost six months to settle themselves down and play themselves in before they would be required to get this information in to parents.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): I have been listening carefully to what my hon. Friend has been saying. Many of these proposals should be commended to the House. However, before he concludes his speech, can my hon. Friend tell the House what the approximate cost would be to an average-sized education authority should the Bill be passed?

Mr. Madel: I am just coming on to estimates of cost.

Clause 4(3) says that the Bill will extend to England and Wales only. I did not think it appropriate to plunge into the difficulties that there could be in Northern Ireland and Scotland where Secretaries of State are responsible.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) asked what this Bill would cost local education authorities. I have had a number of letters on this matter and a number of discussions with local education authorities. The general view is that, in this age of education technology, there would not be much cost. Initially, it would cost a bit to set up the project, but once it had been set up, given the technology that we now have, it would not cost local education authorities much to administer.

What is more, it would save money in the future because local education authorities would be required to have accurate information as to when they had bought particular equipment and in which school it had been put. Also, those parents involved in business or the building industry or who knew something about the general costs of either equipment or maintenance would swiftly be able to bring the matter to the attention of the local education authority when they thought that a particular school needed more money spent on it. In other words, extra information would do nothing but enhance the level of debate, and that is basically the object of the Bill. It would raise the level of debate on education and the level of public knowledge as to how money is spent in particular schools.

I realise that, because of the time factor, we have not been able to have a full day's debate on this matter. We should at least consider the Bill in Committee. Many stumbling blocks that we find in the Bill could then be turned into stepping stones for the better, more knowledgeable education service. Above all, if the Bill became law, it would be doing the very thing that my party and Government have been so keen on for many years —getting more information for parents and ratepayers who are genuinely interested in the way in which money is being spent and in the quality of service. The Bill would help local authorities, teachers, parents and the country, and I commend it to the House.

2.20 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): The Opposition congratulate the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) on introducing the Bill. We hope that it will go into Committee, where it can be discussed further, although I fear that the Conservative Whips may have been at work and will have tried to ensure that the Bill does not proceed.

It is extremely important for both parents and local democracy to be provided with information relating to the costs of individual schools. Parents should be able to compare how effectively the resources that are allocated to different schools are used. I should also like it to be made easier both for the governing bodies of schools and for head teachers and their staff to move allocated expenditure from one heading to another if this is in the best interests of the school. It is not always best for money to be allocated under certain headings without the problems of a particular school being taken into account.

That would also highlight the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) that money provided by the local education authority has in many schools to be supplemented by the parents. It is a sad reflection upon our education system that we are moving further and further away from what we claimed was a free education policy. If this information were made available, it would enable us to highlight that argument.

We welcome the Bill. We hope that it will be given a Second Reading and that it will go into Committee.

2.22 pm

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): I support the Bill. It will bring to bear upon the education system not only the discipline of financial control; it will also improve the quality and standard of the education that is provided in our schools. We who are accustomed to seeing, in global terms, figures put into local education authority budgets have little understanding of what these figures mean when they are translated to the forum of the individual school where that money is spent on a unit cost basis. If we are unable to understand that, how much less likely is it that parents, teachers and those who work in our schools will be able to understand how that money is spent and whether value for money is being obtained?

There is no financial conflict between the financial priorities that the Bill seeks to establish and the broader education priorities. In order to establish whether value for money is being achieved in our schools, whether there is cost-effectiveness across the board, whether the right education priorities are being achieved in proportion to the social or political priorities which are customary in a number of our education authorities, parents, teachers and particularly governors need to know what costs are involved.

Those who sit on the boards of governors of schools know that the work which needs to be done often relates to relatively small maintenance matters—perhaps to the installation of a sink in a science laboratory. The procedure is that the architects department is called in to have a look at it; then somebody comes to measure; next somebody comes to recheck; after that, somebody delivers; then somebody comes to fit the sink; lastly, somebody comes to test the installation. The result is that the cost of installing a relatively small unit, which in our own homes we should think was excessive if it amounted to £70, may well, when the overheads are taken into account, cost about £700—10 times that amount. If that cost were understood by those who are in charge of schools, they would recognise that they were not achieving value for money. The Bill provides a vehicle for that kind of assessment to be made. For these reasons the Bill deserves a Second Reading.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) referred to the closure of schools. One of the features of the Inner London education authority is that, although it may close a school, it does not dispose of the building. This presents a problem. We do not know how much it costs to maintain those buildings while they remain empty. If it possibly can do so, ILEA will cobble up a use for those buildings. It will put somebody or something into the building and make use of it rather than dispose of it. It is interesting to speculate upon the cost of maintaining a building.

I am told that it is impossible to keep a building wind and watertight, aired and ventilated and in a reasonable state of repair for less than £1,000 a week, with a caretaker upon the premises. To spend £50,000 per year maintaining an empty building strikes me as quite unwarranted. If the expenditure were assessed on a unit cost basis we should understand far better how to spend our money and to achieve the right balance between education priorities and ancillary priorities such as maintenance.

The Bill would identify the cost of other ancillary services in individual schools. The school meals service is currently under discussion and one wonders whether we are getting value for money. We recognise the social benefit of providing free school meals for children who might otherwise not get a square meal in the day, but in my area one sees children trooping out of school to buy a bag of chips rather than taking the more balanced and nourishing diet provided by the school meals service. The Bill could assist in identifying and dealing with aspects of that problem.

School transport for recreation and other important activities in the wider curriculum that schools should provide is another important ancillary service. At present there is no way to identify the unit cost, but I believe that the cost per child and per school is far higher than it should be. If school governors could identify actual costs in relation to their own schools, they would have a far clearer idea whether they were obtaining value for money.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Does my hon. Friend agree that, in addition to the benefit of the governors appreciating the unit costs, parents too would be enabled to take a far greater interest?

Mr. Bowden: My hon. Friend endorses a point at which I hinted earlier and emphasises one that I was about to make. If the price of putting a sink in a science room were identified as £700, the parents, teachers and governors would throw up their hands in horror at the idea of their money being spent so wastefully. The Bill will help people to become aware of the costs involved in those circumstances. For that reason, I hope that it will have a fair wind today and proceed to further discussion.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I warmly welcome the Bill and congratulate my hon. Friends on their perspicacity in bringing it forward. Education is rightly one of the Government's greatest priorities. It is our great hope for the future that our people will receive a proper and valuable education so that they can take a real, sensible and positive role and lead the full and satisfying life that is so important to all our young people.

One of the most important aspects of the Bill is that it seeks to extend genuine accountability. That is important not just in the long-term interests of the children but in the interests of the parents and of those running the school. There is the further advantage that administration at a higher level would be helped in assessing from the unit cost breakdown whether real value for money was being achieved.

Some people seem to think that education in this country is entirely free. It is indeed free to the user, but we are paying out huge sums for a system which does not always deliver as satisfactorily as it should.

One of the most important things that can happen to schools in the future is for all parents to realise that they must take a real interest in their children's education—

Mr. Madel rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put, but Mr. Deputy Speaker withheld his assent and declined then to put that Question.

Mr. Soames: If parents can take a genuine interest in their children's education, it is more than likely that they will be able to encourage their children further up the ladder of ambition. It is extremely sad that in my constituency there is immense interest in the schools, but that some parents do not encourage their children. Those children invariably fall by the wayside—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday 15 February.

SMALL BUSINESS BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [18 January].

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate further adjourned till Friday 15 February.

CONTROLLED DRUGS (PENALTIES) BILL

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 40 (Committal of Bills).

LEASEHOLDERS (CHOICE OF INSURERS) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): What day? No day named.

PROHIBITION OF FEMALE CIRCUMCISION BILL

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 40 (Committal of Bills).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That the provisions of Standing Order No. 79 (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.) shall apply to the draft Amendments of the Potato Marketing Scheme 1955, as amended, as if they were a draft statutory instrument; and that the said draft Amendments be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Potato Marketing Board

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Last June, I came before the House with a request for an inquiry into the activities of and proposed amendments to the Potato Marketing Board. That inquiry was held in August and September last year, and the inspector's report was published in December. I am grateful for the opportunity to readdress the Minister's attention, in the light of that report, to a subject of escalating importance to many potato growers in my constituency and throughout the country.

The purpose of the inquiry was to determine whether the Potato Marketing Board and its schemes were effectively aiding English potato farmers. The lengthy hearings conducted by Mr. Brian Capstick QC concluded that the board, especially in the light of its new proposals, would benefit the traditional grower of main crop potatoes —those farmers who lift their crop after 30 June each season. However, the report did not address itself to three vital areas of concern: the position of the first early grower, the quality control of imported potatoes, and the growth in imports of processed potatoes. I shall discuss those three matters.

First, I shall try to explain the cause of the estrangement between the early growers and the board. The original purpose of the potato marketing scheme was to create and protect an economically stable potato market, especially in years of surplus and of drought. Generally speaking, those who subscribed to the scheme abided by the board's decision to grant or curb acreage and so control production. In theory, that notion appears beneficial, but empirically it is not. The process has become the antithesis of success and has destroyed the fair competition of a free market.

Through embracing the scheme, the English potato growers have become the only growers in the European Community to be reined so tightly, and it refutes entirely the policy of the National Farmers Union, which appeared in "The Way Forward" published in September 1984. It states:

> "There will always be scope for a competitive UK industry to improve its place in the market as long as it is allowed to compete on equal terms. British farm policy can only be administered within EEC legislation. Any farming restraints must apply equally throughout the Community."

A free competitive market does not exist for English early potato growers. They are subject to acreage quotas; their Common Market counterparts, the French and the Greeks, are not. While the Potato Marketing Board continues to control and police domestic production, it has absolutely no control over imports. So we learn that for the past four years since the EEC ruling — between the critical harvesting and marketing dates of 1 and 30 June —almost a quarter of the new potatoes that the British household consumes come from abroad. In short, we are giving away my constituents' livelihoods.

My hon. Friend will tell me that the position is about to change. In his most courteous reply to my Adjournment debate, he said that the board was > "aware of the anxiety of early growers and is drawing up proposals under which additional basic area can be allocated annually to first early growers."—[Official Report, 4 June 1984; Vol. 61, c. 137.]

Mr. Brian Capstick, in the report that we are discussing, says:

"If producers intended to lift potatoes in May and June additional basic area would be made available if they could demonstrate a capacity to grow economically additional potatoes for lifting by 24th June".

I do not doubt that my hon. Friend believed, as the inspector believed and as my constituents believed—that is why they did not make more of the matter at the inquiry—that this meant that a freer rein would be given to first early growers, but not so. The writing was on the wall for those who wished to see it, for the terms and conditions under which this gift of additional acreage would be granted had been spelt out—and carefully fudged—by the time the inquiry started, although not, I must make it absolutely plain, by the time my hon. Friend made his statement in this House.

In Potato News in July of last year the scheme was published:

"The Board has approved the provision of one year grants of additional basic area to enable those producers who grow first earlies, intended for marketing during the month of May and the first part of June. This will enable them to achieve an optimum share of the potential market in competition with imported new potatoes".

So far, so good — exactly what we want. The requirement for grant will be the ability to "economically grow for lifting by June 24 the additional area sought in addition to that normally grown".

The Potato Marketing Board will need to "consider whether the increase can be economically accommodated not only by the individual but by the industry as a whole".

I assume that it means the French, the Greek and the Egyptian industries. But the position gets worse.

A first letter to Mr. Arnold Hitchcock, the chairman of the board, produced a reply referring me to Potato News. A second letter on 13 December — prompted by the realisation that my first early growers were not being granted the additional acreage they had sought—came closer to the truth that we now all know. Mr. Hitchcock certainly made the same points, although offering no explanation of what was meant by "economically grown". Potato News had said that "the extension of the area intended for May and June marketing will be made cautiously and the area granted to any one grower may be restricted".

It may indeed; it may be restricted to no additional area at all.

In his letter of 13 December—this was not published in Potato News—Mr. Hitchcock says:

"The Board . . . excluded all those clearly unable to grow and lift by 24 June. It . . . further excluded producers who grow both early and main crop varieties and who had lifted less than 80 per cent. of the early varieties by 24th June 1984".

So what is the result? Fewer than half the applicants were granted a quarter of the additional acreage applied for—a grand increase of 6 per cent. of the acreage of early potatoes planted in a normal year. What is the anticipated yield from that extra 6 per cent.? What proportion of the minimum 22 per cent. of our market that we are currently giving to foreign producers will that win back? The Potato Marketing Board does not know. Asked for the answer this morning, a spokesman for the board said:

"The anticipated increase in yield in tonnes per acre has not been formulated".

So upon what basis has the increase in acreage been calculated?

Such increase in allotted acreage as there has been has been matched against a decrease in the time available to lift early potatoes, now 24 June instead of the second Saturday in July. Again, the marketing board said this morning that that meant that there would be a decrease in the first early potato yield, and, therefore, presumably yet more imports from abroad. The deal begins to look like agriculture's answer to the three-card trick—now we see it, now we do not.

Let me refer briefly and specifically to one Thanet grower, Mr. Rex Goodbar. In evidence to the inquiry, counsel for the marketing board said that Mr. Goodbar would qualify for quota reinstatement and one-year grant. That is down in black and white. On 29 January the marketing board wrote in final response to Mr. Goodbar that "because the basic area committee was not entirely confident that the criteria could be met"

Mr. Goodbar did not qualify. But in reply to the straight question:

"Is your refusal based on evidence proving that I cannot comply with the criteria?"

it said:

"No. You may be able to prove your ability to comply with the criteria which would improve the chances of you having a successful application in the future."

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister made his statement to the House in good faith. He is an honourable man. But I believe that he, the inspector and the early growers have been sadly and profoundly misled by the Potato Marketing Board.

On processed imports the inspector, in his report, says:

"Although I have heard a mass of evidence this is not an area in which I can make any helpful comments in this report beyond saying that the situation calls for continuous vigilance and, if need be, a flexible and resourceful response from the board."

The processed potato is the growth area of the market. It suits the modern housewife, restaurateur and hotelier. Frozen and dehydrated potatoes, suitable for chips and crisps, are infinitely easier to transport than seasonal potatoes and that convenience has obviously attracted our foreign competitors.

Quotas are enforced by the Potato Marketing Board to maintain high prices for English products, but European growers, who are not restricted by such quotas, are profiting by transporting huge quantities of processed products which retail at a lower price, having been transported and transport costs having been paid, than British potatoes.

Giving evidence to the inquiry, Mr. Young, the director of Scott and Newman Limited, insisted that "the foreign penetration in processed potatoes had not been halted" and considered that

"the higher levy (pressed upon domestic produce) might be an advantage to European growers by raising UK prices so that they could compete more easily"

—they being the European producers. He concluded:

"It would take management of the very highest skill and good fortune to keep the GB prices within a narrow band which did not attract imports, particularly of processed potatoes."

Clearly, within the present regime, that skill does not exist.

I refer to the figures given in a written parliamentary answer yesterday. The figures show a growth in domestic consumption in the past four-year period of 377,000 tonnes of processed potatoes. Over the entire period imports accounted for more than two thirds of that growth and in the past disastrous year imports not only accounted for the entire market growth but encroached upon our home production by 11,000 tonnes.

[Mr. Roger Gale]

Quite simply, the processors, because of the board's regime, cannot buy their raw material economically here so they have gone abroad. Even the figures for home-processed potatoes do not reveal what percentage of ware potatoes processed here were originally imported from abroad.

We are talking not about dry statistics, but about British farmers, British industry and British jobs. The Potato Marketing Board is driving those jobs abroad. It is simply not good enough for the inspector to say:

"This is not an area in which I can make any helpful comments".

My hon. Friend is charged with the awesome task of promoting and protecting our home industry. I beg him to do just that before it is too late.

I represent today, I hope faithfully, the views of many potato growers and many hon. Friends as well. My hon. Friends the Members for Gedling (Sir P. Holland) and for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) have particular constituency interests in this matter. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), another major first early area, has been as staunch in his defence of his constituents' interests as I hope I have been of mine.

Britain grows the finest potatoes in the world. But even our quality controls are not transferred to imports, and that brings me, in conclusion, to the third aspect of the report of the inquiry, sadly lacking by omission. While our home-grown produce is, rightly and in the consumers' interests, subject to rigid standards, no such standards apply to imported potatoes. Answering that point in June, my hon. Friend said:

"I have undertaken to study the matter and I hope to be able to say something about it shortly."—[Official Report, 4 June 1984; Vol. 61, c. 137.]

In a written answer yesterday, he acknowledged, with characteristic honesty and candour, that

"Following a comprehensive examination of the feasibility of extending quality controls to imported potatoes I have concluded that it would prove very difficult to take action . . . the introduction of legislative measures would almost certainly carry with it the threat of Community legal challenge. To avoid challenge, we should have to proceed on the basis of the lowest standard obtaining in other member states of the Community, which would not necessarily help our growers." — [Official Report, 7 February 1985; Vol. 72, c. 693.]

My hon. Friend might have added—and I am sure that he believes—that it would not help the consumer, either.

The Potato Marketing Board was set up to create an economically stable potato market and to protect quality. We have established this afternoon that since the EEC ruling four years ago, the board has been unable to control the market, because it cannot control imports, and cannot control quality. Faced with the need in the early potato market for flexibility and resource, it has responded with rigidity and timidity.

I commend the diligence of Mr. Brian Capstick for the many hours of painstaking and expensive hard work that he put into his report. Working with one hand tied behind his back, he has produced a document that will, when the statutory instruments have fought their way through the House, improve the electoral processes of the Potato Marketing Board. However, the product of his diligence and hard labours has not satisfied those who were most to benefit — the growers, who are continually battling against foreign imports. The only solace is an adamant desire for a stringent effort by the Potato Marketing Board to co-operate and support the growers.

My hon. Friend the Minister will say that the new regulations, when introduced, will make it easier for the growers to call a poll and make their opinion heard. Mr. Goodbar writes this morning—I think that we can take it that he is not a lone voice—that

"Whilst accepting that we may call a poll of producers after 1st July, we are concerned that the board will conduct a massive publicity campaign to all producers giving yet more assurances —which may or may not be honoured—in order to get a vote for its continuance. We are concerned that we have neither the addresses nor the finances to match this. In order to have a fair assessment by growers they should be able to have the full facts and hear both sides of the case."

Even allowing for Mr. Goodbar's personal strength of feeling, his point is well made.

My constituents and many others look to my hon. Friend for urgent help. For the first early growers and the processors, the board has had its chance.

2.47 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) for providing this opportunity to bring up to date the developments in the potato marketing scheme since the Adjournment debate that we had together last June. That was before the public inquiry, which was held last August and September to consider the Potato Marketing Board's proposals to amend the potato marketing scheme.

The debate is particularly timely because shortly we shall be seeking the approval of both Houses—indeed, I believe that it will be next week—to the draft scheme amendments which were laid before the House on 20 December and to two orders giving effect to revised support arrangements for potatoes, which were laid before the House on 23 January.

My hon. Friend concentrated on three issues, none of which is specifically covered by the amendments which we shall discuss in the House next week. They were debated at the inquiry, but they were not the main thrust of the inquiry. I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I say a little about the inquiry and developments since then before I refer to his three points.

My hon. Friend talked about many potato growers throughout the country being concerned about the points that he raised. I do not deny that some potato growers are worried. However, it is important to do this—and I have to do it. We must look at the matter in perspective. My hon. Friend did not say how many growers were much more supportive of the board's proposals. It is worth making the point that the chairman of the inquiry estimated that about three quarters of 1 per cent. of the total number of registered producers objected to the board's proposals. That puts the situation into perspective. Therefore, I must consider the matter as a whole and take into account the views of other growers.

For the sake of completeness, let me set out the background to the public inquiry. I shall do so briefly, because I referred to it in the Adjournment debate in June. Towards the end of 1982 the Government decided to conduct a thoroughgoing review of the support arrangements that we apply to potatoes. There is, of course, no Community regime under the common agricultural policy for potatoes, and we are therefore free to operate our own national arrangements, subject only to keeping the Commission informed of the measures adopted. Our present system of support is based on powers contained in the Agriculture Acts of 1947 and 1957, which enable Ministers to provide guaranteed prices or assured markets for potatoes. Our arrangements are founded essentially on the annual determination of a guaranteed price and the making of a deficiency payment if the price received by producers falls below the level of that guaranteed price.

The Government act jointly with the Potato Marketing Board over market support arrangements, but I stress, in view of what my hon. Friend has said, that the board is a producer organisation and is independent of the Government. That means that if producers wish to oppose, for example, the amendments put forward or to revoke the scheme, they have the opportunity to do so if they can get sufficient support from other growers. Effectively, the decision is theirs.

I am sure my hon. Friend welcomes the fact that one of the amendments put before the House by the marketing board makes it much easier for producers to object to proposals or to demand a poll to revoke the scheme. That amendment proposes to reduce the number of producers needed to demand such a poll from 1,000 to 400 and to reduce the qualifying area from 8,000 to 4,000 hectares. That is a small proportion of the number of producers.

The objectives of the review to which I have referred were to consider whether our support arrangements were still relevant to the current and future needs of the industry and to re-examine the need to continue to commit public funds for potato market support. That is relevant to what my hon. Friend said, because the review led eventually to the proposals considered by the inquiry. Therefore, the review was a fundamental stage in the arrangements that we propose for the next five years.

The review was conducted against the background of the Potato Marketing Board facing severe financial difficulties resulting from its inability to raise sufficient income from producers to meet its full share of market support costs, and a consequent need for the Government to provide additional funding to help the board meet the cost of its 1982 crop support operations.

From the review, we were looking for ways of ensuring a stable, efficient and competitive potato industry, while securing the financial self-sufficiency of the marketing board and limiting the extent and hitherto open-endedness of the Government's future commitment to market support financing.

I announced the outcome of that review to the House on 29 February last year. We concluded that we had to take into account the fact that the potato market is highly volatile and that yields can vary dramatically from season to season. For example, this season main crop yields are almost 8·5 tonnes per hectare higher than last season. We therefore concluded that a sudden switch to a free market would significantly increase the chances of price instability and could adversely affect levels of production and consumption.

Our second conclusion was that stabilisation of the potato market, within a limited managed market framework, would help to avoid disruption, would retain producer confidence in the crop and would, thus, give consumers some assurance of supplies at reasonable prices.

The Government's aim was to reduce our commitment to the costs of market support by the end of a five-year running-in period for the new arrangements. That was, and is, an important part of our review. We felt that a greater responsibility should be placed on producers for meeting the costs of market support in years of average surplus and that the Government should contribute to such costs only when exceptional surpluses arose. As a first step to achieving that aim, the board agreed to increase its levy on producers to around twice the current level. That will enhance the size of the board's own resources and facilitate the building up of reserves.

As I announced to the House on 29 February last year, the Government agreed to help the board along the path to financial self-sufficiency by making grants to meet any shortfall in producer funding of market support during the five-year running-in period. Moreover, because the board cannot increase its income from producers, through the higher levy, until the second half of this year, we are making similar shortfall grants available to cover this season's support buying obligations.

The Government's share of this season's support costs under the financial agreement with the board cannot be calculated until after the season is over and the average producer price has been determined. In the meantime, the Government will advance such money as is necessary to keep the board solvent. The House will be kept informed of the level of expenditure through the normal financial procedures.

The 1984-85 spring Supplementary Estimates include £5·869 million for this purpose. This commitment was undertaken to give the new package of support measures a fair wind and to enable the Potato Marketing Board to enter 1985-86 without a heavy debt burden which would severely undermine its ability to pay its way in the future.

There are two further elements in the financial package which I refer to briefly and put on the record. My right hon. Friend the Minister informed the House on 24 June 1983 that the Government were making loans of up to £7·4 million available to enable the Potato Marketing Board to meet its 1982 crop support obligations. In the event, only £5·9 million of the facility was drawn upon. If the House approves the package of measures now before it, we shall make appropriate arrangements to have the amount written off again so as not to saddle the board with heavy indebtedness as it enters the new arrangements.

The final element in the package changes the emphasis of market support from the current system of deficiency payments to the provision of an assured market for a much smaller element of the crop. The House will be asked to approve the continuation of the deficiency payment arrangements, which are extremely open-ended, applying as they do to about two thirds of the crop, and impose a potentially very high commitment on the Government. Instead, we shall provide assured markets for less than 600,000 tonnes of potatoes in the United Kingdom and will redraw the cost-sharing formula to bear more heavily on producers in seasons of average surplus.

That is the background, and these proposals were accepted by the Potato Marketing Board and by the farmers' unions, which undertook to commend them to their members. There also arose a consequent need for the board to propose certain amendments to the scheme.

One of the principal objectives of the new arrangements was to place the board on a much sounder financial footing for the future. To achieve this, the board undertook to propose an amendment to the scheme which would have the effect of increasing its levy on producers to £75 per hectare in 1985 from its current level of £36 per hectare.

The potato marketing scheme lays down in precise detail the procedures which have to be followed in proposing amendments. I explained these to my hon. Friend during our last Adjourmment debate. Subsequent to that, we decided to hold a public inquiry in view of the objections and representations received following the formal announcement by Ministers that the board had submitted proposals to them. Every objection and representation that we received was passed on to the chairman of the inquiry. In his report he concluded that there were 130 objections, 84 of which were in standard form, and 34 written representations.

I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that it was a very thorough inquiry. Every opportunity was given to every objector to put his case, and they were all thoroughly sifted. I pay tribute to the way in which Mr. Brian Capstick carried out that inquiry.

Following the inquiry, Mr. Capstick came to the conclusion that, with some little modification, the proposals that had been put, with amendments from the board, should be accepted in full. The modifications which he suggested were put formally to the board, which accepted them. It is on that basis that we are putting them before the House.

In the light of the criticism that my hon. Friend makes, I repeat that the most thorough consideration has been given to the whole matter. There was a full opportunity for a poll which, if a sufficient number had demanded it, would have taken place. Every scope has been given to the objectors. It is clear that the vast majority of producers support what the board proposes. That is what the inspector concluded after his lengthy, exhaustive and fair hearing.

I come to the specific matters raised by my hon. Friend. The first concerns early growers. As my hon. Friend will know, this is a matter for the board and not for the Government, but I understand that assisstance is being given in three ways, and I have seen my hon. Friend's correspondence about this matter with the chairman of the board.

The early lifting rebate will be increased from 50 to 75 per cent. of the ordinary contribution paid by growers. Secondly, additional basic area will be allocated to producers who intend to lift their potatoes in May and June to enable them to compete more effectively with imported early potatoes. That is happening this year. Thirdly, arrangements will be introduced for basic area May and June production which will be outside normal quota arrangements. These special arrangements will apply only to established early producers—those who have received early lifting rebate during the previous three years.

As my hon. Friend will understand, I cannot comment on specific cases such as the one that he raised. However, the board is making a genuine attempt to help the early potato growers. This is a start and an experiment for the first year. The point about its insistence on those who have been in early potatoes before is to ensure that we have competitive growers. This is an area which is extremely sensitive to volumes reaching the market. Prices can change very substantially, even in a week. That is the reason for the board's intention to proceed cautiously. On the whole, it seems sensible.

Careful phasing of supplies has been shown in the past to be essential if market disruption is to be avoided. That also is why the board has been having discussions with the importers to ensure that there is not that kind of market disruption.

As my hon. Friend knows, I have encouraged the Potato Marketing Board to co-operate with the processors most closely, otherwise market opportunities may be lost. I take my hon. Friend's point about that, because it is one that concerns me. We should ensure that our own growers are thoroughly competitive and that they meet market requirements such as the processors require.

There is a growth in demand for processed products, in which the United Kingdom industry must compete. Potato producers must take account of the needs of the market to maximise their returns. For their part, the potato processors must work with producers to help them understand their requirements. It is that dual consultation that I have been encouraging. I agree that the Potato Marketing Board has a vital role to play in this area, and I believe that it is responding as my hon. Friend asks it to do. There is now a much greater understanding of the importance of co-operation among all parties, and the processors have told me that relationships are much better. I shall continue to encourage that.

Finally, I promised that I would make a statement about imported potatoes. I told my hon. Friend yesterday about the real problems, especially on the Community side, of going further and that there was a real danger that we would have to proceed on the basis of the lowest common denominator, which would not necessarily help our growers. I can assure my hon. Friend that I have looked at this most carefully, but that for the reason that I gave him yesterday I have not felt able to extend quality and grading controls to imported potatoes.

I believe that the inquiry and the whole process of review has been most thorough. I hope that it will be acceptable to the vast majority of growers.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute past Three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE

Ethnic Surveys

Mr. Bellingham asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether the Government have taken a decision on future ethnic surveys in the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government have decided to follow the ethnic surveys undertaken in the north-west and county of Avon with surveys of all remaining non-industrial staff in a phased programme during 1985 to 1988. The first stage of the programme will cover all non-industrial staff in the east and west midlands later this year. All new entrants to the Civil Service will also be covered as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. Separate arrangements are being worked out for industrial staff. Consideration will be given to further monitoring of recruitment schemes in the light of the results of the recruitment surveys undertaken last year in the north-west and county of Avon. The data from these surveys are now being analysed and we expect to publish the report in the spring.

ENVIRONMENT

Dipper Population

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on which rivers and streams the dipper has been found to have declined because of the relatively high acidity level; and by how many it has declined in each case.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department is aware of two surveys examining the relationship between acidity levels and the dipper population, one carried out by the Welsh water authority on 17 tributaries of the Wye, the other by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds in conjunction with that authority on 74 sites throughout the Principality.

The findings have not yet been published, but I understand both surveys suggest that higher acidity is associated with a lower dipper population. In only one case, the River Irfon, are historic data available to compare populations over time; a 70 to 80 per cent. decrease in the dipper population has been recorded between the mid-1950s and 1982, during which time the acidity level increased considerably.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current number of registered keepers of birds of prey.

Mr. Waldegrave: The total number of keepers registered is 3,050. The number of those registered as keepers of birds of prey, with live birds is approximately 2,400.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many registered breeders are currently breeding (a) the golden eagle, (b) the goshawk, (c) the merlin and (d) the peregrine falcon and (e) other raptors; and how many of each bird was bred in 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: The numbers of registered keepers who bred or attempted to breed birds of prey, and the number of such birds subsequently registered as bred in captivity in 1984 were:

Species	Breeders	Birds
(a) Golden Eagle	1	1
(b) Goshawk	30	38
(c) Merlin	28	35
(d) Peregrine	41	43
(e) Others	308	888

Multiple Occupation Properties (Fire Regulations)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to give greater protection to those living in properties in multiple occupation by increasing the stringency of the fire regulations applicable to such properties.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 11 December 1984 at column 443.

Water Authorities

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implications for the quality of services provided by water authorities of the proposed increase in their rate of return on net assets.

Mr. Macfarlane: The effect cannot be precisely assessed, but the higher rates of return will support higher investment in water services. Although priorities differ from region to region, this is expected to include higher spending on renovation and renewal of sewers and water mains, with consequent benefit to service levels, and additional outlays aimed at improving the quality of rivers, estuaries and coastal waters.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has made of the effect upon the construction industry of the proposed changes in the financial framework of the water authorities.

Mr. Macfarlane: The financial targets that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) on 12 November 1984 at columns 68-69, will allow a significant real increase in capital investment by the water authorities.

The planning investment levels for the authorities in the public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) are £852 million (1985-86), £914 million (1986-87) and £964 million (1987-88). This will enable the authorities to maintain and improve services, secure further improvement in the quality of our rivers, estuaries and beaches and make faster progress on the replacement, repair and maintenance of sewers and water mains. As most of this work will be contracted out to the private sector, it will be of direct benefit to the construction industry.

Water Charges

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to introduce a statutory rebate system for water charges to lower paid customers.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. It has been the policy of successive Governments that, if help is needed, it is provided through the social security system. Water services charges are taken into account when supplementary benefit is calculated, and some 3 million households already receive help in this way.

Radioactive Discharges

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the monitoring of radioactive discharges from the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority facility at Winfrith Heath, Dorset.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. The Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food carry out regular monitoring and I am satisfied that discharges continue to pose no threat to the public.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which radioactive contamination emanating from the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's research facility at Winfrith Heath has been discovered near Ventnor, Isle of Wight; and what steps he is taking to seek to prevent a recurrence.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that the radioactivity referred to resulted from routine liquid discharges from the Atomic Energy Establishment Winfrith and were radiologically insignificant. There is no cause for concern.

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what revisions he proposes to make to the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977 in regard to agricultural holdings in predominantly residential areas under class 5 of schedule 1 of that order.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government's proposals to amend the General Development Order were set out in a paper issued for public consultation on 23 January 1984. Copies were placed in the Library. The paper includes proposals for tighter controls over the development of livestock buildings in the vicinity of residential property. These, and the many other proposals for changes in the GDO, prompted a wide response from many quarters, and we are currently considering these responses and their simplications in detail.

Stolport, Newham

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what has been his response to the representation made to his Department by the British Helicopter Advisory Board in reply to its letter of 14 August 1984 about planning permission for the proposed stolport at the Royal docks in Newham;

(2) what his response has been to the views put forward by Short Brothers of Belfast about the proposed runway length for the stolport at the Royal docks in Newham.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend has not responded. The representations are being considered together with others made as part of the consultation process.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what opportunities will be provided for experts from interested parties, including the London borough of Greenwich, to comment on the additional evidence put forward by the Department of Transport in its letter of 31 July 1984 on the control of noise from the proposed Stolport at the Royal docks in Newham.

Mr. Macfarlane: All the parties have been given the opportunity to comment on the additional evidence and, in a second round of consultation, on each other's comments.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how the additional evidence put forward by the Department of Transport in its letter of 31 July 1984 on the control of noise from the proposed Stolport at the Royal docks in Newham is likely to affect the section 52 agreement between the Port of London Authority, John Mowlem and Co., the London Docklands Development Corporation and Newham council.

Mr. Macfarlane: As was stated in the Department's letters of 14 August 1984, the additional evidence related to the drafting of a condition recommended by the inspector following the public local inquiry. It would not be appropriate for my right hon. Friend to comment on the section 52 agreement as such, which is a matter for the parties to the agreement.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the noise impact on Thamesmead residents, both now and as Thamesmead is developed, of the De Havilland STOL aircraft Dash 8 using the proposed Stolport.

Mr. Macfarlane: None.

North Pennines

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is now in a position to make a statement concerning the proposed designation of the North Pennines area as an area of outstanding beauty.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend is still considering this matter. A further announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the latest expected date of completion of the Falkland Islands airport including the ancillary Army provision; and how this compares with the original date;

(2) what is the latest estimate of the cost of the Falkland Islands airport and ancillary provision; and how this compares with the original estimate.

Sir George Young: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Publicly Owned Land (Sales)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Hams on 21 January, Official Report, columns 266-67, concerning the sale of public land on the vacant and derelict land register, what steps have been taken by each local authority to dispose of the land; whether tenders have been dispatched in each case; what are the dates of return; and how he proposes to monitor progress in each case.

Mr. Macfarlane: With the exception of Nottingham city council, which sought and received extension of time, the authorities have advertised the sites as being for sale in the Estates Gazette and elsewhere. The sales are all by tender, and tender documents are available for prospective purchasers.

The directions issued by my right hon. Friend specified that the closing date for the receipt of tenders would be no earlier than six weeks and no later than eight weeks after the date on which the advertisements appeared. The dates between which the closing dates should accordingly fall are:

Locations and Dates
23 February—9 March 1985
Barmpton Lane West, Darlington

6 February
Oozewood Road, Royton, Oldham

26 January—9 February
Doxford Park Way, Silksworth, Sunderland

I shall be maintaining a close watch on how the sales proceed.

Water Act 1973

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on what day his report and account was required, under paragraph 37 of schedule 3 to the Water Act 1973, to be sent to the Comptroller and Auditor General for the year 1983-84.

Mr. Gow: The report and account for 1983-84 was required to be sent by 30 November 1984 and was delivered on 27 November 1984.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, on what dates he has given directions to water authorities under his powers in paragraph 35 of schedule 3 to the Water Act 1973 since 1979; and to which authorities.

Mr. Gow: No such directions have been given.

Planning Advice

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to publish advice on the planning issues raised by non-retail uses in shopping areas.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have today published a development control policy note on service uses in shopping areas which replaces and considerably enlarges upon advice dating from 1969. The note is available from HMSO and is applicable to both England and Wales. I hope that the note will provide a sound basis on which both potential developers and local planning authorities can assess problems posed by proposals for service uses, which in some cases, as for example with amusement centres, can have a significant effect on local amenity.

Brent Labour Group

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the circumstances under which a notebook, the property of the Brent Labour group, reached the office of the Minister for Local Government.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: This would not be appropriate at the present time.

WALES

Children's Books

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of (a) the number and (b) the total sales value of children's books published in the Welsh language during the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: This information is not held centrally.

Areas of Special Scientific Interest (Designation)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to ensure that where, under the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, areas are designated as areas of special scientific interest then there should be provided an opportunity for the owner or occupier of that land, or other interested party, to appeal against that designation should they so desire.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The matter was considered during the passage of the Act, and we concluded that the right balance was struck by requiring the Nature Conservancy Council to take account of any representations of objections made by owners and occupiers of proposed sites of special scientific interest before notifying such sites.

Housing Authorities (Revenue)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish details of the total income of housing revenue accounts of Welsh housing authorities that have come from (a) rents, excluding rebates, (b) rent rebates, (c) interest from capital receipts from the sale of council dwellings, (d) Government subsidy, (e) non-statutory contributions from the rate fund and (f) other sources for 1984-85, and for each of the preceding five years.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Based on returns made by local authorities to the Welsh Office, the information is estimated to be as follows:

	1979-80 £ million	1980-81 £ million	*1981-82 £ million	*1982-83 £ million	1983-84 £ million	1984-85 £ million

*For the years 1981-82 and 1982-83 rent rebate payments made by DHSS to tenants in receipt of supplementary benefit have been included in line (a) and not in line (b). This is due to the form in which the information was supplied by local authorities.

Homes Insulation

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a table giving, by quarter since their inception, for Wales (a) the number of dwellings insulated under the local authorities energy conservation programme and a breakdown of the body which completed the work, (b) the cost of the programme and (c) the number of dwellings insulated under the home insulation scheme and a breakdown of tenancies to whom the grants were paid, (d) the amounts of the payments, (e) the number of 90 per cent. grants paid and their costs and (f) the financial allocation for each of the past financial years to each of these schemes and the allocation for the current financial year.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The available information is given in the following tables. Details of the type of body carrying out the work and of the type of tenancy are not collected centrally.

Welsh Water Authority (Staff)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest figure reported to his Department of the number of (a) full-time and (b) part-time employees at the Welsh water authority; and what information he has as to how many full posts have been subject to voluntary redundancy agreements over the past five years.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: At the end of December 1984 the Welsh water authority employed 4,698 full-time and 100 part-time staff. The number of full-time employees who have been granted voluntary redundancy over the last five years is 940.

Heath Hospital, Cardiff

Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of the settlement reached on 10 February 1984 between the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation and S. W. Milburn and Partners and W. S. Atkins and Partners pertaining to structural and material defects in the Heath hospital, Cardiff.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The settlement was reached between the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation, acting on the advice of counsel, and the other parties. It was a term of the settlement that the agreement should be confidential to the parties, subject only to the right of confidential disclosure to the Welsh Office and the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will now place in the Library a copy of the report commissioned by the Welsh Health Authority Technical Services Organisation from Ove Arup and Partners on the structure and soundness of the Heath hospital, Cardiff.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have placed a copy of the reply and appendices in the House of Commons Library.

Road Accidents (Statistics)

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many rear seat passengers were killed in road traffic accidents in Wales during 1984;

(2) what was the total number of road deaths in Wales during 1984; and if he will give a breakdown of this figure;

(3) how many motorists who died during 1984 in road traffic accidents in Wales and who were either drivers or front seat passengers would appear not to have been wearing seat belts at the time of the accident.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information requested is not yet to hand, but it is anticipated that provisional figures will be available in May.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Confidential Papers (Disposal)

Mr. Shersby asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will consider the introduction of a confidential waste disposal system similar to that operating in the Civil Service for hon. Members who have to dispose of confidential papers they may receive as members of Select Committees.

Mr. Biffen: The Clerk of the Select Committee concerned will always arrange for the shredding of any confidential Committee papers which a Member may wish to dispose of.

TRANSPORT

Minister's Letter (Cost)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the full cost to public funds of the letter dated 30 November sent out by his Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to selected Members of Parliament.

Mr. Ridley: About £350.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any information as to the additional costs incurred by British Rail to date arising from the strike in the mining industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that British Rail expects to have lost some £215 million of freight receipts by the end of January 1985 as a result of the strike in the mining industry and refusal by a small number of its employees to handle coal offered for movement by rail.

Scheduled Air Services

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there is a current licence for a scheduled air service to operate between Leeds/Bradford airport and Gatwick.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Yes. It is held by Metropolitan Airways.

Fog Detection

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Transport what analysis his Department has made of the Marconi MET-3 electronic fog detection system which has been in use on the M4 for the past nine months.

Mrs. Chalker: The initial trial of the Marconi MET 3 fog detection system on the M4 commenced in November 1983. Following modifications by the company in November 1984 to overcome technical problems, the trial and evaluation has been extended.

Airports

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport what material was available to the airport inquiries in 1981-83 in relation to the effects of expenditure on airport development on (a) public expenditure patterns, (b) the ancillary effects on jobs of large-scale public investments in airport development in various regions and (c) the relationship between airports policy and regional investments and development.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The material available to the airports inquiries in 1981-83 is referred to in the inspector's report which was published on 10 December. The appendices in part IX provide an index of inquiry documents.

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent developments at United Kingdom regional airports have been approved in the last 10 years; what was the total cost in each case and the cost to central Government; and which proposed developments have not been approved.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

North-West (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State's recent visit to the north-west region.

Mr. David Mitchell: I visited the north-west region on 23 January, when I had a useful meeting with representatives of a number of local authorities in the area. We discussed issues relating to the Government's proposals for the bus industry. I also met a number of representatives of the local media.

Sinclair C5

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he had about the development of the electric vehicle now known as the Sinclair C5 prior to bringing forward the legislation providing for electrically-assisted pedal cycles to be treated as pedal cycles and not as motor vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Section 24 of the Transport Act 1981 provided for an electrically assisted pedal cycle, of a class to be prescribed in regulations, not to be treated as a motor vehicle. In 1982 the Department consulted on draft regulations which, amended in the light of consultation, were laid before Parliament on 8 July 1983 as the Electrically Assisted Pedal Cycles Regulations 1983.

During that period a number of individuals and firms, including Sinclair Research Ltd., expressed interest in the potential both for bicycles and tricycles. Some, but not Sinclair Research Ltd., provided information on their ideas for development and the regulations were drafted to allow manufacturers freedom of design within strict limits on speed, weight and power. The Sinclair C5 meets these limits as well as other safety requirements principally for brakes and lights. We do not expect it to have an accident record dissimilar from that which applies to pedal cycles generally.

Manchester Airport

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list those organisations which have recently approached him seeking the expansion of Manchester airport;

(2) how many applications have been made for new scheduled services from Manchester airport by (a) British airlines and (b) foreign airlines; and which of those services would involve new scheduled destinations;

(3) if he will list all those foreign airlines which operate scheduled services out of Manchester airport; and what is the total number of passengers to have travelled with each such airline using Manchester airport in the last year for which figures are available;

(4) asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report all those destinations from Manchester airport currently served by (a) domestic flights and (b) international flights; and in the case of each destination how many passengers travelled that route in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Manchester (Outer Ring Road)

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the original date for publication of the orders for the Denton to Middleton section of the Manchester outer ring road; what is the current date for publication of the orders; when the public inquiry was originally due to be held; and when he now expects the public inquiry to open.

Mrs. Chalker: When I wrote to the hon. Gentleman last July, I indicated that draft orders might be published at around the end of 1984 and that the public inquiry might get under way in the autumn of this year. We now plan to publish the orders in a few weeks time and to start the public inquiry next winter.

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the results of his Department's investigation into the possibility of routeing the Manchester outer ring road over the redundant Chadderton power station site.

Mrs. Chalker: Our investigations into the suggested alternative route through the disused Chadderton power station have shown that it would cost about £2 million more than the original route and involve a loss of up to £4 million worth of economic benefits. I have therefore decided that the original route should form the basis of our statutory orders.

I have written to the hon. Gentleman.

Crash Barriers

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the order of priority and timetable of his Department for the installation of crash barriers on the next 20 dual carriageways in England and Wales.

Mrs. Chalker: I will answer this question shortly.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to install continuous crash barriers on the A38 between Exeter and Plymouth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have no plans for the installation of further lengths of safety fencing here. However, my Department is currently undertaking a review of the criteria relating to the provision of safety fencing and should this indicate that further lengths can be justified, I shall not hesitate to authorise their provision.

Road Accidents (Statistics)

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many fatal and non-fatal road accidents occurred in the county of Suffolk from July to September 1984 compared with the same period in 1983; if he will give national figures for the same period; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The number of injury accidents are shown in the table below. All 1984 data are provisional.

Injury accidents: Suffolk and Great Britain: July-September, 1983 and 1984

Fatal accidents
Suffolk	11	28
Great Britain	1,259	1,304
Serious and slight accidents
Suffolk	669	775
Great Britain	62,649	60,032

Although the increase in fatal accidents may appear large, the numbers are relatively small and are liable to short-term fluctuations. It is too early to say whether this increase is part of a continuing upward trend.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many rear seat passengers were killed in road traffic accidents in England during 1984;

(2) what was the total number of road deaths in England during 1984; and if he will give a breakdown of this figure;

(3) how many motorists who died during 1984 in road traffic accidents in England and who were either drivers or front seat passengers would appear not to have been wearing seat belts at the time of the accident.

Mrs. Chalker: Provisional estimates of road casualties in 1984 will be published in April, and detailed breakdowns of the final figures will be given in "Road Accidents Great Britain" later in the year. Figures for 1983 can be found in tables 37, 38, and 47 of the 1983 edition, a copy of which is in the Library.

Aerial Spraying

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the areas of (a) agricultural land and (b) woodland sprayed in each year since 1977 by (i) fixed wing aircraft and (ii) helicopters; if he will give for each year the total number of aircraft involved; and if he will estimate for each year the proportion accounted for by pesticide application.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to the reply, 22 January 1985, c. 400]: Details are available for pesticide use only, and for the total number of aircraft, as follows:

*Hectares of agricultural land sprayed with pesticides by aircraft

	Fixed wing	Helicopters	Unknown	Total
1978	177,807	150,663	2,857	331,327

Chief Inspecting Officer of Railways (Report)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the annual report of the Chief Inspecting Officer of Railways for 1984 to be published formally; and what is the earliest date on which a copy could be made available to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Train Accident (Rugby)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 24 January, Official Report, column 483, if he will explain the circumstances in which a British Rail engineer's train was propelled past a signal at danger on to the main line; at what estimated closing speed the two trains collided; what damage was caused to the two trains involved, to the track, to signalling equipment and to overhead lines and how long they were each out of service as a result; what was the nature of the minor injuries sustained and if those affected are eligible for compensation; what is the nature of the action taken by British Rail to prevent a recurrence; whether the driver of the passenger train involved has been commended for his action; what is the nature of the disciplinary action taken against those members of British Rail staff held responsible for the accident and what were their functions at the time of the accident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Tourist Board

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the loans over £10,000 made at a rate of interest lower than normal commercal rates by the Scottish Tourist Board to aid tourist development projects in each of the last five years, specifying also, where appropriate, the ultimate holding company of the recipient of the loan.

Mr. John MacKay: There were none.

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total number and value of loans made by the Scottish Tourist Board to aid tourist development projects in each of the last five years where the loan carried a rate of interest lower than normal commercial rates.

Mr. John MacKay: There were none.

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the grants over £10,000 given by the Scottish Tourist Board to aid tourist development projects in each of the last five years, specifying also, where appropriate, the ultimate holding company of the recipient of grant.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total number and value of grants given by the Scottish Tourist Board to aid tourist development projects in each of the last five years.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is set out in the table:

Year	No. of grants approved	Value (£)
1979-80	116	2,765,703
1980-81	126	1,208,830
1981-82	165	2,645,489
1982-83	188	3,284,108
1983-84	250	5,486,147

Dialysis Machines

Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of dialysis kidney machines in operation on an area basis in Scotland; and how many will be in operation in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. John MacKay: Information about the number of machines is not collected centrally, since the differing patterns of use of such machines means that there is no direct relationship with the number of treatments given.

Hospital Closures (Lothian Region)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) when he intends to announce his decision on the proposed closures of Bruntsfield and Deaconess hospitals in Edinburgh;

(2) whether he has had any communication from the Lothian health board about proposed hospital closures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Lothian health board decided on 10 January to seek the approval of my right hon. Friend for closure of the Bruntsfield and Deaconess hospitals. I understand a formal submission by the board is in course of preparation which I expect to receive shortly.

My right hon. Friend and I shall give careful consideration to the proposals from the health board and the comments and representation made on the suggested closures. It is not possible at present to say when a decision is likely to be announced.

Community Nursing Services

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money was spent in each of the last three years on the community nursing services in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mental Illness

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how much money was spent in each of the last three years on (a) full-time day centres and (b) part-time day centres for people suffering from mental illness;

(2) how much money was spent in each of the three most recent years for which figures are available on specialist services for people suffering from mental illness who are living in the community;

(3) how much money was spent in each of the last three years on staffed hostels for people recovering from mental illness by (a) local authorities and (b) health boards;

(4) how much money was spent in each of the last three years on (a) support staff for people suffering from mental illness who are in supported accommodation and (b) social work support for people suffering from mental illness living in their own homes.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally.

Terrorism

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons have been (a) killed and (b) injured in Scotland in each year for the longest available period of time as a result of terrorist activities; and if he will break down the figures specifying whether the terrorists were (i) from western Europe, (ii) from Northern Ireland, (iii) from the Republic of Ireland, (iv) from other parts of the world and (v) of unknown origin.

Mr. Ancram: I have nothing to add to the information contained in my reply to the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) on 2 February 1984, at column 301-2.

West of Scotland Science Park

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement regarding the action of the Scottish Development Agency property division taking over the West of Scotland science park, Maryhill; and what consultation with Glasgow and Strathclyde universities took place beforehand.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Postal Voting

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the votes cast by post in June 1983 in each of the constituencies of Scotland were on the grounds of (a) removal, (b) physical disability and (c) all other grounds.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not held centrally, and there is no obligation on the returning officer to record it.

Traffic Accidents

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many rear seat passengers were killed in road traffic accidents in Scotland during 1984;

(2) what was the total number of road deaths in Scotland during 1984; and if he will give a breakdown of the figure;

(3) how many motorists who died during 1984 in road traffic accidents in Scotland and who were either drivers or front seat passengers would appear not to have been wearing seat belts at the time of the accident.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not yet available.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of Manpower Service Commission mode A trainees in inner Merseyside during 1984 were from ethnic minorities.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of mode A places in youth training scheme schemes and what proportion of mode B places available in September 1984 have now been taken up.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Members as soon as possible.

Low-paid Workers

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what evidence he has that a reduction in the wages of low-paid workers relative to median earnings will increase the employment prospects in the relevant sectors of the economy;

(2) what evidence he has that a reduction in the real earnings of low-paid workers will increase the employment prospects in the relevant sectors of the economy.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is general evidence that suggests that a reduction in the cost of labour improves employment prospects. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newham North East (Mr. Leighton) on 22 October 1984 at column 481. There is also evidence that suggests that the employment prospects of certain groups which tend to have below average earnings, notably women and young people, would benefit from a reduction in real and/or relative earnings. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 17 December 1984 at column 37 and my hon. Friend's reply to him on 14 January 1985 at column 32.

Wages Councils

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate he has made of the effect of the abolition of wages councils on wage levels in the industries concerned.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are considering all available evidence and opinion on this matter.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what number and what proportion of men of working age are full-time employees, part-time employees, self-employed and not employed, respectively; and what are the comparable figures for women.

Mr. Alan Clark: Preliminary estimates from the 1983 labour force survey in Great Britain are given in the following table:

	Men aged 16-64		Women aged 15-59
	Number (000)	Per cent	Number (000)	Per cent.
All employed*	13,240	77	8,880	57
Full-time employees	11,040	64	4,750	30
Part-time employees	240	1	3,280	21

	Men aged 16-64		Women aged 15-59
	Number (000)	Per cent.	Number (000)	Per cent.
Self-employed	1,660	10	490	3
Not employed	3,880	23	6,740	43
All	17,120	100	15,620	100

* Includes those whose hours of work were not stated and those in employment who did not state whether they were employees or self-employed.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of employers and managers, professional and scientific workers, supervisory staff and skilled manual workers, respectively, were women in the latest year for which figures are available; and what have been the trends in these figures in the past decade.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information for Great Britain is set out in the table:

	Women as proportion of all in group (per cent.)
	1971*	1981*	1983†
Employers and managers	19	22	22
Professional and scientific workers	6	11	11
Supervisoy staff	‡	37	‖
Skilled manual workers	12	11	12

* Estimates based on census of population.
† Estimates based on labour force survey.
‡ Estimate not available on a comparable basis to the 1981 estimate.
‖ Estimate not available.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Shop Hours (Auld Report)

Mr. Martin Stevens asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement about the Auld report on shop hours.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to announce the Government's intentions in the near future.

Lambeth (Targeting and Surveillance)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what basis the decision was taken to launch police targeting and surveillance operations in Lambeth recently; and whether this involved his Department or the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The decision to launch police targeting and surveillance operations in Lambeth was taken by the Commissioner personally in the light of a marked increase in the number of offences of street robbery in the borough. The operation was fully discussed by the community/police consultative group for Lambeth.

Khat

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he plans to refer the drug khat to the Advisory Committee on Misuse of Drugs with a view to controlling its importation and use.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has no such plans at present, but he is keeping the position under review.

Police Officers (Rent Allowances)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why rent allowances are paid to police officers; whether similar payments are made to police officers buying or owning their own homes; and what is the total annual cost of such allowances.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Under the Police Regulations 1979, every police officer must either be provided with free accommodation by the police authority or be paid a rent allowance in lieu. Rent allowance is paid to owner-occupiers, as well as to officers, living in rented accommodation. The purpose of the allowance, which was first introduced in 1920, is to ensure that police officers who provide their own accommodation are in a broadly similar financial position to those who are provided with free accommodation by the police authority. The cost of rent allowances in England and Wales in 1983-84 was about £148 million.

Ms. D. S. Gelleburn

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now reply to the letters sent to one of his Ministers of State on 1 October 1984 and 3 December 1984 by the hon. Member for Gower, regarding Ms. D. S. Gelleburn, of 42 Faraday Road, Clydach, Swansea.

Mr. Waddington: I wrote to the hon. Member on 21 January 1985.

Electoral Registration (Mental Hospital Patients)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to remove the restrictions in section 7 of the Representation of the People Act 1983 on patients of a mental hospital using the hospital address for electoral registration; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No. The provisions which enfranchised voluntary patients resident in mental hospitals have been in force less than two years and it is too soon to consider changing them.

Brent Labour Group

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the progress of police investigations into the circumstances under which the Labour group office at Brent town hall was burgled on 16 November; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the theft of a handbag and its contents from Brent town hall was reported to Wembley police on 16 November 1984. The handbag and its contents remain missing. On 22 January Wembley police received a letter from Mr. Martin Coleman, leader of the Labour group on Brent borough council, reporting the theft of an exercise book from Brent town hall and suggesting that it might have been stolen at the same time as the handbag. The exercise book was handed on to the police that same evening. Police investigations into both thefts are continuing.

Society of Civil and Public Servants (Meeting)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why he banned members of the National Union of Mineworkers from attending a meeting of the Society of Civil and Public Servants at his Department on 22 January.

Mr. Brittan: Taking into account my Department's direct responsibility in relation to the law and order aspects of the miners' dispute, I did not consider it right to allow speakers from outside to address a meeting on this subject on Home Office premises. It is open to the union concerned to arrange wider meetings elsewhere.

Foxley Corner, Wiltshire (Incident)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Wiltshire as to the circumstances in which the windows of a parked van were broken by police officers and one of the women passengers was injured on the B3098 road at Foxley corner between Urchfont and Wedhampton on the night of 21 to 22 January; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constable tells me that police inquiries into the incident are continuing and that some of the people involved have recorded complaints under the Police Acts of 1964 and 1976 against the officers concerned. The chief constable is appointing an officer from an outside force to investigate these complaints. Five women were arrested as a result of the incident and have been bailed pending further inquiries. It would be inappropirate for me to comment further at this stage.

Fire Regulations

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the code of practice for fire regulations in multi-occupied residential premises; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to issue the code of practice on fire safety in houses in multiple occupation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Preparation of the code has taken much longer than expected, but it is hoped that a draft which will form the basis for consultation with interested organisations will be available in the next few months. When the final version of the code is published a copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to issue to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis guidance under section 106 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 on arrangements for obtaining the views of local people on police matters.

Mr. Brittan: Copies of the guidance that I have issued to the Commissioner have been placed in the Library of the House and sent to every right hon. and hon. Member for a constituency in the Metropolitan police district. I have also issued a circular giving non-statutory guidance to police authorities outside London about their duties under section 106 of the Act. Copies of this document have also been placed in the Library of the House.

General Election Statistics

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the votes cast by post in June 1983 in each of the constituencies in England and Wales were on the grounds of (a) removal, (b) physical disability and (c) all other grounds.

Mr. Mellor: I regret that this information is not available. It is not held centrally and there is no obligation for the registration officer to record it.

PRIME MINISTER

Malaysia (Visit)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she is now in a position to announce the date of her visit to Malaysia.

The Prime Minister: No. But I hope soon to be in a position to announce the reinstatement of the visit which had to be postponed last year.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Prime Minister if the limited list proposals apply identically to England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

The Prime Minister: Yes, though the details of implementation may vary slightly because of differing primary legislation.

Museums and Galleries Commission (Chairman)

Mr. Faulds asked the Prime Minister when she expects to fill the post of chairman of the Museums and Galleries Commission.

The Prime Minister: Following the death of Lord Howard in November, consultations concerning the appointment of his successor as chairman of the Museums and Galleries Commission have taken place and the post will be filled as soon as possible.

Permanent Secretaries

Mr. Thurnham asked the Prime Minister what are the current criteria by which appointments of permanent secretaries are determined.

The Prime Minister: Permanent Secretary appointments are made by the Minister in charge of the Department concerned, with the approval of the Prime Minister on advice by the head of the Home Civil Service. The criteria for particular appointments will differ according to the nature of the appointments, but will be related to the relevant qualifications and experience of the person concerned.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Mason asked the Prime Minister if she will give the total costs to date of the miners' strike to Her Majesty's Government's Departments and the publicly owned industries.

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in answer to a question by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 24 January, at column 501.

Chile

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will list all meetings held between Ministers and members of the Chilean Government and military since April 1982; and what was the purpose of each meeting;

(2) if she will list all public statements made by Ministers since April 1981 on the régime in Chile, and on United Kingdom relations with Chile.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will list all arrangements and treaties agreed with Chile since 1981.

The Prime Minister: No treaties have been signed or agreed since that date. The Government maintain a normal range of diplomatic relations with Chile.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what steps she has taken since 1981 to bring to the attention of the Chilean authorities British concern regarding human rights in Chile.

The Prime Minister: The Government have repeatedly expressed their concern both in public and directly to members of the Chilean Government at the human rights situation there.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will consider reimposing an embargo on sales of arms to Chile.

The Prime Minister: No. The Government maintain normal relations with Chile, including defence sales, but our policy remains to refuse the supply of items which in our judgment are likely to be used for internal repression.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the United Kingdom voting record at the United Nations since 1979 on all resolutions concerning Chile.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom voted as follows on resolutions criticising the human rights situation in Chile in the UN Commission on Human Rights and the UN General Assembly:

	Commission on Human Rights	General Assembly
1979	(United Kingdom not a member)	Yes
1980	Yes	Yes
1981	Abstention	Yes
1982	Yes	Abstention
1983	Yes	Abstention
1984	Yes	Yes

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the policy of arms sales to Chile since March 1982; and what is the future policy.

The Prime Minister: The Government continues to follow the policy established in 1980: that we are willing to supply defence equipment to Chile with the exception of items which, in our judgment, are likely to be used for internal repression.

Argentina (Arms Sales)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister how many people have been arrested since January 1983 and charged with the theft of engine parts and their subsequent sale to Argentina; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I understand that the police have been investigating the possibility of transactions of this kind having taken place and that a number of persons have been arrested and charged with offences which may possibly be connected with such transactions. These investigations are still being actively pursued and it is not possible to say more at this stage.

Diego Ramirez

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what use the United Kingdom has of the air base at Diego Ramirez; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government are not aware of any air base on Diego Ramirez island.

Adelaide Island

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister when the proposal from the Chilean Antarctic Institute for use of Adelaide Island was made; and what discussions were held before agreeing to its use by Chile.

The Prime Minister: The initial approach was made by the Chilean Antarctic Institute to the British Antarctic Survey in December 1983, and preliminary discussions between them were held in Santiago in January 1984. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office held consultations with the Natural Environmental Research Council — which owned the facilities at Adelaide—and the Britsh Antarctic Survey before agreeing to the proposal in August 1984.

Nuclear Materials

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government concerning the transfer of nuclear materials, and in particular enriched uranium, to countries which have not signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

The Prime Minister: The transfer of nuclear materials, including enriched uranium, is authorised in accordance with the policy set out in 1976 by the then Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan); that is to say:

"When considering the export of nuclear equipment, material, or technology, we shall study each case on its merits. Our first consideration will always be the provisions of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the Euratom Treaty, and whether or not the prospective customer has concluded a Safeguards Agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Our detailed requirements will include the application of IAEA safeguards or comparable safeguards which are verified by the IAEA to exported nuclear equipment and material; an assurance that whatever we export will not be used to manufacture nuclear explosives for any purpose; an assurance that our exports will be adequately protected against the possibility of theft or sabotage; and assurances that if the equipment or material that we export is re-exported, then the new purchaser will be required to give the same assurances of safeguards, non-explosive use and physical protection as were given by the original customer."

Flight Lieutenant Richard Thomas

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what investigations the Ministry of Defence carried out into the death of Flight Lieutenant Richard Thomas in an aircraft accident in January 1983; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Flight Lieutenant Richard Thomas, who was on loan to the Chilean air force, died while flying a low-level training mission. Since he was flying one of their aircraft, the Chilean authorities investigated the circumstances of the crash. Their findings wer subsequently passed to the Ministry of Defence, which concluded that no further action was required.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if the discussions held by the Falklands Legislative Council on the amendments to the Falkland Islands constitution were held in public; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: All the discussions in the Legislative Council were held in public.

Scientific and Military Co-operation

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards scientific and military co-operation with Governments not elected by democratic means.

The Prime Minister: The Government's policy is to pursue scientific and military co-operation with other countries where it is in our interests to do so. We treat each proposal on its merits.

Uneconomic Farms

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what is the Government's policy on subsidising uneconomic farms.

The Prime Minister: The Government do not have such a policy.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what would be (a) the loss of revenue if income tax thresholds and national insurance thresholds were raised to £3,250 for a single person and £4,250 for a married couple and additional tax allowances of £780 were given for each child and (b) the saving in expenditure if all benefits, including family income supplement, child benefit and all housing benefits and tax allowances were abolished; and what would be the net weekly spending power of a man with two children earning £110 per week with a rent of £25 and rates of £5 per week (i) now and (ii) assuming all these changes had been made simultaneously.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to my hon. Friend shortly.

Public Relations Consultants

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what constraints she seeks to place on other employments of persons employed by her part-time as public relations consultants (a) in the public sector and (b) elsewhere.

The Prime Minister: My office does not employ public relations consultants.

Ministerial Cars (Parking Offences)

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister how many drivers in charge of ministerial cars committed parking offences in 1984; and in respect of how many of these cases fines or other penalties were imposed.

The Prime Minister: There were 659 cases in 1984, all of which incurred a penalty.

Local Authorities (Government Grants)

Mr. Favell asked the Prime Minister how much has been paid by central Government in grants and subsidies for which local authorities are the ultimate recipients, showing separately (a) rate support grants, (b) rent and rate rebates and housing benefit, (c) housing subsidies and (d) any other grants or subsidies divided by category for each year from 1978-79 to 1984-85, giving the figures both in cash terms and expressed at current prices; and if she will provide similar data in respect of each individual metropolitan county council and each of the metropolitan boroughs within their areas.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 23 January 1985, c. 424]: Table 1 gives the available information in cash terms for England, Wales, Scotland and Great Britain. The GDP deflator may be used to convert the figures to current prices. The approximate values of the deflator are as follows:

	Values
1978-79	56·2
1979-80	65·7
1980-81	77·9
1981-82	85·7
1982-83	91·4
1983-84	95·5
1984-85	100·0

Because there are different possible interpretations of which grants and subsidies are received ultimately by local authorities and which are passed on, comprehensive information on grants and subsidies has been given.

The table has been prepared by DOE, the Welsh and Scottish Offices and DHSS. Authorities' outturn returns have been used for some of the information. The following notes are general.

* The rate support grant system changed in 1981-82. Figures for earlier years are not on a comparable basis. The figures for 1978-79 to 1980-81 include the needs, resources and domestic elements. Thereafter, they include block grant and domestic rate relief grant. The figures up to 1981-82 are final entitlement. Figures for 1982-83 onwards are latest estimates after holdback.

‡ The figures for 1982-83 to 1984-85 are subject to adjustment on the basis of final audited claims.

Notes to tables 2(a) to 2(d)

The coverage is the same as for table 1. With regard to table 2(a), rate support grant was not paid to metropolitan counties before 1981-82.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Deaf Children (Teachers)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the number of fully trained teachers for deaf children; and how this compares with his estimate of the number of such teachers required to provide deaf children with the education they need.

Mr. Dunn: On 31 March 1983, the latest date for which information is available, the numbers of full-time teachers in service in maintained and non-maintained schools in England and Wales who were recorded as holding recognised qualifications for teaching deaf or partially-hearing children was 1,840. My right hon. Friend estimates that this figure is very close to the number of such teachers required.

Open University

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the number of students who have enrolled with the Open University each year since it was established in 1969.

Mr. Brooke: The Open University admitted its first undergraduates in 1971. In 1973 its continuing education programme admitted associate students, who take single undergraduate level courses but do not follow a degree course. The university extended its continuing education programme in 1974 by introducing a programme of sport courses and packs, mainly in vocationally relevant subjects. The figures for the number of students enrolled in each year in each category are as follows:

	Undergraduate Students	Associate Students	Short Courses and Packs
1971	19,581	—	—
1972	31,902	—	—
1973	38,424	1,885	—
1974	42,636	1,350	1,584
1975	49,358	4,188	1,768
1976	51,035	4,578	118
1977	55,127	5,576	6,096
1978	58,788	6,923	13,713
1979	60,963	8,778	10,311
1980	61,446	7,889	25,317
1981	60,550	7,078	18,507
1982	64,422	7,150	29,818
1983	66,403	7,367	40,756
1984	66,763	8,675	*43,031

Student Grants

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the value of student grants in real terms since 1978-79 using 100 as a base in 1978-79.

Mr. Brooke: The information requested is as follows:

	Ordinary maintenance grant (£)	Percentage value in real terms (September 1978=100)
1978-79	1,100	100
1979-80	1,245	97
1980-81	1,430	96
1981-82	1,535	93
1982-83	1,595	90
1984-85	1,775	91

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing for each year since the introduction of student grants (a) the value of the grant, (b) the real value when compared with the rise in retail prices and (c) the real value when compared with the rise in average earnings.

Mr. Brooke: The information requested is as follows, based upon 1962-63 which marked the inception of the present mandatory awards system:

	Ordinary maintenance grant £	Real value in percentage terms (September 1962=100) of the grant deflated by: (a) Retail prices	(b) Average earnings
1962-63	320	100	100
1963-64	320	98	93
1964-65	320	94	86
1965-66	340	95	86
1966-67	340	92	80
1967-68	340	91	78
1968-69	360	91	76
1969-70	360	86	71
1970-71	380	85	66
1971-72	430	88	67
1972-73	445	85	62
1973-74	485	85	59
1974-75	605	90	62
1975-76	740	87	60
1976-77	875	90	62
1977-78	1,010	90	66
1978-79	1,100	91	63
1979-80	1,245	88	62
1980-81	1,430	88	58
1981-82	1,535	84	56
1982-82	1,595	82	53
1983-84	1,660	81	51
1984-85	1,775	83	52

Primary Schools (Toilets)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many primary schools in (a) England, (b) Yorkshire and Humberside, (c) West Yorkshire and (d) Kirklees still rely in whole or in part on outside toilet provision for their pupils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected centrally.

Rajneesh School, Suffolk

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if Her Majesty's inspectors of schools have conducted any investigation of the Rajneesh school at Herringswell, Suffolk; and if he will publish the findings.

Mr. Dunn: The Medina Rajneesh school, Herringswell, is an independent school and is subject to the provisions of part III of the Education Act 1944. It has been visited on several occasions by Her Majesty's inspectors but has not been the subject of a full inspection which would have led to a published report. Her Majesty's inspectors are due to visit the school again shortly.

European Organisation for Nuclear Research

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he anticipates that his advisory board for the research councils will be in a position to advise him further about the United Kingdom participation in the European Organisation for Nuclear Research.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the chairman of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils (ABRC) expects to receive the report of the group chaired by Sir John Kendrew, which is reviewing the United Kingdom's participation in high energy particle physics, in April 1985. That report is expected to include recommendations about United Kingdom participation in the European Organisation for Nuclear Research (CERN). The review group will also report to the chairman of the Science and Engineering Research Council (SERC), as required by its terms of reference. The ABRC and the SERC will thereafter submit their advice on the report, including advice about United Kingdom participation in CERN, to my right hon. Friend.

Manchester (School Governors)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is now delaying the approval of new rules of management for Manchester governors of primary and secondary schools; what representations he has had on the matter; what replies he has sent; and if he will make a statement announcing a decision.

Mr. Dunn: Articles of government—formerly called rules of management — for primary schools do not require my right hon. Friend's approval. In September 1982, Manchester local education authority asked whether proposed revision of articles of government for county secondary schools were such as would receive the necessary approval. The view that they were not has been the subject of various exchanges with the authority, with which the matter currently rests. Representations on the authority's proposals have been received from an hon. Member and from a national teachers' organisation.

University Grants Committee (Scotland)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has recently received proposing a separate University Grants Committee for Scotland.

Mr. Brooke: None.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, before publishing his Green Paper on higher education, it is his intention to consult appropriate Scottish bodies on the case for a separate University Grants Committee for Scotland.

Mr. Brooke: No. The Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council appointed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is considering future strategy for higher education in Scotland, including the arrangements for providing institutions with financial support. The Government will consider these matters in the light of the council's report, which is expected later this year.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to ensure that secondary school pupils and their parents are informed about the introduction of the General Certificate of Secondary Education examination.

Sir Keith Joseph: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have arranged for an explanatory leaflet about the new general certificate of secondary education (GCSE) examination to be distributed to all secondary school pupils and their parents in England and Wales. The leaflet is being distributed to employers' organisations and other interested parties as well. Copies have been placed in the Library.

We plan to publish a "general introduction" to the GCSE, designed for teachers and others professionally concerned with examinations, shortly. We are also considering how best to make fuller information available in due course to employers and others.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

World Bank Special Fund

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution Her Majesty's Government will commit to the World Bank special fund for famine areas of Africa; and what factors are to be taken into account over long-term development aid in that region.

Mr. Raison: Her Majesty's Government will be represented at a meeting of possible donors which the World Bank has convened in Paris on 31 January. While we strongly support the purposes of the special facility, we are reluctant to see the funds available for bilateral aid diminished by a further multilateral commitment. Among the factors we take into account in deciding on long-term aid to areas affected by famine are development needs, the prospects of using aid effectively, and the importance of working closely with the World Bank and other major donors.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984

Mr. Frank Field asked the Attorney-General when the Government intend to implement section 3 of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984.

The Attorney-General: Section 3 of the Act came into force on 12 October 1984. If the hon. Member intended to refer to part III of the Act, it is intended to bring that part into force in July.

Official Secrets Act 1911

Mr. Dobson asked the Attorney-General if he will provide details of proceedings that have been commenced under sections 1 and 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 since 9 February 1983 set out in the manner of appendix II to the Franks report.

The Attorney-General: Details of proceedings that have been commenced under sections 1 and 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 since 9 February 1983, set out in the manner of appendix II of the Franks report, are as follows:

An employee of the Salvage Association engaged by the Department of Trade to assist negotiation of a salvage contract was alleged to have disclosed details of rival tenders to one of those tendering. Both were tried at the Central Criminal Court and acquitted.

A registry clerk at the British embassy in Bonn concealed items of diplomatic mail which had not been processed. On conclusion of his tour of duty he took them to his home in Kent where he abandoned them on moving house two years later. They were found by the subsequent occupier in September 1982 and comprised in excess of 400 documents, of which 141 were classified "confidential" and 51 "restricted". He pleaded guilty to each of two charges and was fined £600 on each charge. He was dealt with summarily.

A serving police officer passed information concerning motor vehicles obtained from the Police national computer. The information was used in connection with criminal offences. He was charged with three offences and tried at Cardiff Crown court. He was convicted on one offence and fined £100.

A clerk employed in the Foreign Office passed copies of two minutes written by her Secretary of State to colleagues to a national newspaper. She pleaded guilty at the Central Criminal Court and was sentenced to six months imprisonment.

A civil servant employed by the Ministry of Defence stands charged with unauthorised disclosure to a Member of Parliament of certain documents in his possession. His trial is currently taking place in the Central Criminal Court.

A civil servant employed by the Home Office stands charged with unauthorised disclosure of a document in his possession. Committal proceedings are pending.

1983

There have been two completed cases where an offence under section 1 has been charged since 9 February 1983.

In one case an employee of the security service passed information to a foreign power. He was tried at the Central Criminal Court, convicted, and sentenced to 23 years imprisonment.

A service man stationed in Cyprus was charged under section 1 of the 1911 Act with allegedly communicating a confidential signal to an unauthorised person. He pleaded not guilty, was tried at the Central Criminal Court, and acquitted.

Eight service men stationed in Cyprus are at present charged with offences under section 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911. The trial is to be held at the Central Criminal Court later this year.

Jury Vetting

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Attorney-General on what statutory basis he authorises the vetting of juries; and what guidance he issues to the special branch in such cases.

The Attorney-General: No statutory authority is required for jury checking. Both the prosecution and the defence in any jury trial have the right to inspect a copy of the panel from which the jury will be chosen so that they may inquire about the members of the panel and decide whether any should be challenged. So far as the prosecution is concerned, I issued guidelines in July 1980 — which were merely a revision and elaboration of guide-lines issued by my predecessor, Mr. Sam Silkin— requiring the Director of Public Prosecutions to seek my personal authority in every case in which such checks are proposed. A copy of those guidelines is in the Library of the House. I issue no guidance direct to the Special Branch, but paragraph 6 of my guidelines indicates the scope of the inquiries which the Director may request the police to make.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Non-Proliferation Treaty

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his proposals to extend and develop the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Luce: We consider the non-proliferation treaty to be fundamental to our policy of preventing the spread of nuclear weapons. We take every opportunity to extend its coverage by persuading states that have not yet acceded to do so. At the NPT review conference in Geneva in September, we shall urge the parties to re-affirm their commitment to it. We have no proposals for changes to the treaty itself.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to obtain an agreement to prevent any form of nuclear assistance to a country that has withdrawn from the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Luce: We are not aware that any state party is contemplating withdrawal from the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the level of the United Kingdom's representation at the non-proliferation treaty meeting in Geneva; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The United Kingdom delegation to the preparatory committee for the non-proliferation treaty review conference is headed by the leader of the United Kingdom delegation to the Committee on Disarmament.

No final decision has been taken regarding representation at the review conference itself which begins on 2 September. It is probable that the principal United Kingdom statement will be made by a Minister of State, as was the case at the first and second review conferences in 1975 and 1980 respectively.

Iran-Iraq War

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the response of the Government to the Red Cross appeal for intervention to end the Iran-Iraq war.

Mr. Luce: The most recent appeal by the International Committee of the Red Cross on the Iran-Iraq conflict in November 1984 concentrated on securing the help of the international community in persuading Iran to respect the Geneva conventions on the treatment of prisoners of war. In response, the representative of the Presidency in Tehran made in demarché to the Iranian Government on behalf of the Ten, expressing concern at the inability of the ICRC to fulfil its obligations in Iran.

We gave full support to the recent investigation by a United Nations team into the treatment of prisoners of war by Iran and Iraq.

Operation Moses

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government had any knowledge of Operation Moses prior to its public acknowledgement in Israel; whether Her Majesty's Government had any involvement in the operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: We were aware of reports that some Falashas were able to leave Sudan, with Israel as their final destination, but not of the project now known as Operation Moses. There was no United Kingdom involvement. The movement of Falasha Jews to Israel is a matter for the Governments of Israel and Ethiopia, the country of which the Falashas are citizens.

Irish Foreign Minister

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply, No. W153, to the hon. Member for Billericay on 21 January, what substantive reply to the representations of the Irish Foreign Minister of 15 January has now been given by Her Majesty's ambassador to Dublin.

Mr. Renton: As I said to my hon. Friend on 21 January, Her Majesty's ambassador has explained our stated policy on the Security Forces in Northern Ireland. No further substantive comment on the incident on 15 January would be appropriate until the police have completed their inquiries and their report has been considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Foreign Governments (Representations)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, in their attitude towards representations from foreign Governments concerning events in the United Kingdom, Her Majesty's Government differentiate between the Government of the Irish Republic and other foreign Governments.

Mr. Renton: Our attitude towards such representations depends on their nature and our relations with the Governments concerned. We have close relations with the Government of the Republic of Ireland and are ready to listen to their views.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what will be the arrangements for civilian use of the Falkland Islands airport; and how this will affect its use for all military and allied purposes.

Mr. Renton: The existing airport at Port Stanley is used both by the Royal Air Force and by the Falkland Islands Government Air Service. The detailed arrangements for the operation of the new airport under construction at Mount Pleasant are at present under discussion. They will reflect the fact that in addition to its military function, the airport will come to have an increasingly important civilian and developmental role.

ENERGY

BNOC (Oil Prices)

3. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of the British National Oil Corporation to discuss the price of oil.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I frequently meet with the chairman of the British National Oil Corporation.

25. Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will instruct the British National Oil Corporation to reduce its official oil price.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: No.

Polkemmet Colliery

4. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will pay an official visit to Polkemmet colliery.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have no plans to do so.

Standing Charges

9. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received from the electricity and gas boards concerning the operation of their arrangements for levying standing charges.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Decisions on prices, including standing charges, are a matter for the electricity and gas boards. Such questions are raised from time to time during regular discussions with the industries.

"Cold Comfort for the Poor"

16. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Energy what study he has made of the report by the Greater London Citizens Advice Bureaux "Cold Comfort for the Poor", a copy of which has been sent to him, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My right hon. Friend and I have received copies of the report from the director of the Greater London citizens advice bureaux service and our comments have been passed to him.

National Coal Board (Membership)

19. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he is satisfied with the current performance of the members of the National Coal Board.

Mr. Peter Walker: Yes.

Coal (Subsidies)

20. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the level of production subsidy per tonne of coal for each country in the European Economic Community.

Mr. David Hunt: No up-to-date figures are available. The latest published figures take no account of the vastly increased subsidy per tonne which the United Kingdom taxpayer will be making to the coal industry this year as a result of the current dispute.

Coal Industry

21. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the strike in the coal mining industry.

22. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on the strike in the coal mining industry.

23. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he will next meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss the present state of the coal industry.

27. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he intends to meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss the present coal mining dispute.

29. Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current situation in the coal mining industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer to the reply given earlier today to the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell).

26. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he makes of the extent to which the current dispute has reduced the long-term market for coal.

Mr. David Hunt: The extent of the long-term damage will depend on the terms on which the dispute is settled. Clear recognition by all concerned of the economic realities of coal production should permit the National Coal Board to win a substantial market based on assured and competitively priced supplies.

28. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the numbers of mineworkers resuming work since the beginning of 1985.

Mr. David Hunt: So far in 1985, 10,159 former strikers have returned to work throughout the British coalfield.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of the coal output lost as a result of the industrial dispute in the industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Published figures show that between the start of the overtime ban on 1 November 1983 and 27 October 1984 an estimated 55,694,000 tonnes of deep-mined output are estimated to have been lost to the National Coal Board as a result of the dispute. However, we still have very high stocks at both the pits and the power stations.

24. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what response he has made to the leaders of the Council of Churches in Wales and the Roman Catholic Church in calling on the Government to set up an independent review body to examine the future of the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that I met the leaders of both the British Council of Churches and the Council of Churches for Wales last week. I share the concern expressed by the churches about the damage this pointless dispute is inflicting on the mining industry and its communities. Like them, I also wish for a swift settlement that will offer the industry a viable future.

Privatisation

17. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the current estimated savings by his Department for 1984-85 as a result of privatisation schemes.

Mr. Peter Walker: Privatisation is only one element in my Department's successful cost-cutting programme and its contribution cannot be isolated.

Electrical Appliances

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will introduce legislation to require electrical appliances to be labelled at the point of sale with information relating to their average running costs and energy efficiency.

Mr. David Hunt: Members of the Association of Manufacturers of Domestic Electrical Appliances are already including in pre-sales literature basic data on the energy consumption of major appliances. The Energy Efficiency Office has prepared leaflets which enable retailers and prospective purchasers to convert this data into a likely annual running cost. I hope more progress will be made by voluntary arrangements and the pressure of consumers.

Uranium (Namibia)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Energy when the Central Electricity Generating Board's contract with Rio Tinto Zinc for the supply of Namibian uranium is due to terminate; and if any plans exist for renewal of the contract after its expiry date.

Mr. Goodlad: The contract with the Rossing mine has already terminated and no plans have been made to renew it.

Combined Heat and Power Schemes

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy which of the proposed lead city schemes for combined heat and power offer the best prospects of an attractive return on investment.

Mr. David Hunt: Estimates of the returns offered were published in Energy Report No. 53.

Sleipner Gas Contract

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what consideration is being given to the use of substitute natural gas produced from coal as an alternative to the Sleipner gas contract; and whether any assessment has been made by Her Majesty's Government of the annual tonnage of coal which would be required for this purpose.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: On current estimates, synthetic natural gas produced from coal would be far more expensive for the gas consumer than either the British or Norwegian gas currently on offer to the British Gas Corporation and is not therefore under consideration as an alternative to Sleipner.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he is now in a position to announce his decision on the British Gas Corporation's request that it be allowed to import natural gas from the Sleipner field; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Natural Gas Reserves

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has revised his forward estimates of the amount of natural gas available from the United Kingdom continental shelf since the Brown Book was last published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Revised estimates of gas reserves on the United Kingdom continental shelf are being prepared and will be published in the next edition of the Brown Book.

Gas Consumption

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has revised his forward estimates of the likely consumption of gas in the United Kingdom since the Brown Book was last published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The latest published estimates are contained in my Department's proof of evidence for the Sizewell B public inquiry.

National Coal Board (Public Relations)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he gathers about expenditure by the National Coal Board on public relations consultants; and which are the firms and individuals employed.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department does not gather such information.

Nationalised Industries (Contracts)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his policy regarding the award of contracts by nationalised industries under his responsibility other than by open public competition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The award of contracts is a commercial decision for the management of the industries.

Alternative Forms of Energy

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress was made in 1984 relating to research into alternative forms of energy.

Mr. David Hunt: Progress has resulted in the confirmation of passive solar and waste combustion as economically attractive technologies. We have made encouraging progress with our major projects in geothermal and wind energy and have signed a memorandum of understanding on collaboration with the United States.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Retailers (Discounts)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of his Department's review of relative discounts by suppliers to large and small retailers.

Mr. Fletcher: The Director General of Fair Trading expects to publish later this year the results of his fact-finding exercise to update the information in the report by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on discounts to retailers.

Companies (Liquidation Law)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with the present state of company liquidation law; when he expects fully to implement the recommendations of the Cork report on insolvency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: No, I am not satisfied. That is why we propose to amend the legislation by the Insolvency Bill which was introduced in another place on 10 December 1984. The Government's response to the report of the review committee on insolvency law and practice—the Cork report — was contained in the White Paper "A Revised Framework for Insolvency Law" published last February, Cmnd. 9175, which met with general approval. A number of modifications to the White Paper proposals made in light of comments received, including wider grounds for relief for directors from automatic disqualification, were announced on 1 August 1984. The principal of these were described in a memorandum, copies of which were placed in the Library of this House.

Civil Defence

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will consider the formation of a consultative body consisting of representatives of the trade unions, industry and his Department to co-ordinate the role of industry in civil defence.

Mr. Butcher: A study to assess the essential requirements which industry could be called upon to supply for civil defence purposes, and industry's capability to meet them, is being undertaken. Until this study has been completed, it would be premature to consider the formulation of a consultative body on the lines suggested.

Electric Batteries

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will initiate consultations with the manufacturers of electric batteries about the introduction of a code of practice requiring all batteries to carry a date of manufacture and date by which they should be sold.

Mr. Fletcher: I am not aware of any substantial public complaint in this area, nor am I convinced that the date-stamping of batteries would be of significant benefit to consumers.

Books and Journals

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the approximate annual sales value of (a) books, (b) newspapers and (c) periodicals, journals and magazines, in the United Kingdom for the latest available period of 12 months.

Mr. Channon: Estimates of annual sales in the United Kingdom for the 12 months ended September 1984 are as follows:

(a) books	1·8
(b) newspapers	2·5
(c) periodicals, journals and magazines	1·8

China (Trade)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to improve trade with the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Channon: Trade between Britain and the People's Republic of China continues to increase. The Government of the People's Republic of China have told the Government that China is aiming for sustained economic growth with emphasis on the development of energy, transport, communications and the modernisation of industry and agriculture, to which Britain can contribute. There are, therefore, good opportunities for a steady increase in trade, which are enhanced by our very good political relations. My noble Friend the Minister without Portfolio will shortly lead a high level trade mission to China, which I am sure will make a significant contribution to the development of trade between Britain and China.

Pharmaceutical Products (Exports-Imports)

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the cost of pharmaceutical imports, and the value of pharmaceutical exports, during 1983.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Shipbuilding (Privatisation)

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the currently envisaged timetable for the privatisation of the United Kingdom shipbuilding and composite yards and the manner in which it is proposed to dispose of these yards.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend told the House on 25 July 1984 that he had asked British Shipbuilders to dispose of its warship building interests by 31 March 1986 and to make substantial progress to that end by 31 March 1985. Brooke Marine, Yarrow Shipbuilders and Hall Russell have already been placed on the market and British Shipbuilders will issue the sale documents for the other yards as soon as possible.

As my right hon. Friend said in July, the Government would prefer to see the yards sold separately or in small groups, but we also asked British Shipbuilders to set in hand contingency plans for the flotation on the stock exchange of all or some of the companies in case individual sales may not be achieved.

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will publish in the Official Report the current level of capacity utilisation in those United Kingdom shipyards scheduled for privatisation;

(2) what discussions his Department has had with potential purchasers of privatised shipyards about possible Government financial support for maintaining after privatisation capacity utilisation at levels similar to those occurring prior to privatisation.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Second-hand Cars

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has concerning the number and value of second-hand cars bought and sold in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Channon: The available information relates only to sales of used motor vehicles and motor cycles in Great Britain and is shown in the table:

1978	4,148*
1979	4,847*
1980	5,067*
1981	4,992*
1982	5,691†

* Inclusive of VAT
† Exclusive of VAT

Figures for 1982 were published in an article in "British Business" on 10 August 1984, pages 590 to 594. For 1978 to 1981 they were published in pages 652 to 658 of "British Business" on 15 July 1983.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has concerning the number of firms currently involved in the retailing of second-hand cars.

Mr. Channon: No information is available on the number of businesses involved in the retailing of second-hand cars.

United Medical Enterprises

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has monitored the subsequent disposal of assets of United Medical Enterprises, formerly a subsidiary of the National Enterprise Board; what is his practice in relation to the monitoring of such sales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Post Office (Counter Services)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what investigations he made, and on what operational evidence he relied, when determining that the counter services of the Post Office should secure a real unit cost reduction of 5 per cent. over the three years 1982 to 1985; and if he will place such evidence in the Library.

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. Friend has made no such determination.

Radio Wavebands (Consultative Document)

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what conclusions he has reached on the future of bands I and III in the light of the response he received to the consultative document, Cmnd. 9241; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie [pursuant to the reply, 9 January 1985, c. 442]: We received a considerable number of constructive and detailed responses. The proposals in the consultative document for competing local trunked systems providing common base station and message handling services in band III received widespread support.

The prevailing view favoured the adoption of a common signalling standard for trunked systems based on MPT 1323 and the preparation of such a standard, in consultation with the manufacturers, is making good progress.

Proposals were also submitted for the establishment of one or more very large new national radiotelephone systems in band III with interconnection to the public switched telephone network (PSTN) and for the immediate adoption in band III of single sideband modulation.

The consultative document suggested that the question of a further national radiotelephone service should not be considered until the two new 900 MHz cellular services had had an opportunity to develop. These services, which started this month, have a large band of spectrum already set aside for them.

Given the need to make the best use of available spectrum and the publicly stated basis on which the cellular competition took place, I have concluded that it would not be right to license any further such national systems for the time being, but the position will be reviewed towards the end of 1986 in the light of growth in the demand for radiotelephone services with PSTN interconnection and experience of their development.

In the meantime, however, I am exploring further, with advice from the Director General of Telecommunications, the possibility of authorising the immediate establishment of one or more large national networks either without interconnection or possibly very limited interconnection. I have also asked the director to advise whether, in the context of the promotion of competition in communications in the United Kingdom, existing public telecommunications operators should be eligible to operate systems in band III.

Subject to further consideration and to the director's advice, applications may be invited in the spring for one or two national networks and, in certain of the main conurbations, for up to five or so smaller local ones, with the possibility of some PSTN interconnection. The first generation of smaller systems and at least the first national system would be licensed to operate in accordance with the agreed common signalling standard. If it were decided to authorise two national systems preference in the case of the second might be given to applicants proposing the use of more advanced technology such as single sideband. Proposals would also be invited for local or national two-way mobile data transmission systems.

Further consideration is being given to a number of other issues raised in response to the consultative document and to the future use of band I.

Outward Mission Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those countries which are not covered by the outward mission scheme; and what are the reasons for each exception.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 24 January 1985, c. 507]: Those countries which are not covered by the outward mission scheme are:

Austria
Belgium
Canada
Denmark
France
Federal Republic of Germany
Italy
Netherlands
Norway
Switzerland
Sweden
United States of America

BOTB's resources are concentrated in those areas where it is believed that they are needed most. The markets in western Europe are nearby, and relatively well known, and the absence of a comparatively small travel grant should not deter serious exporters.

North American countries are also familiar, and there is no language barrier. The normal BOTB group mission approach is not generally appropriate for the very large and diverse north American market. There is, however, a special limited scheme for missions connected with the BOTB's Export USA drive.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pesticides

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will give the list of organisations to which were sent, by his Department, copies of the two papers "Pesticides Legislation: Outline of Proposals" and "Pesticides Legislation: Explanatory Notes".

Mrs. Fenner: The documents referred to by my hon. Friend were circulated widely to organisations and individuals concerned in or about the manufacture, distribution and use of pesticides including environmental and consumer interests. I will arrange for a copy of the consultation list to be placed in the Library of the House and for a copy to be sent to my hon. Friend for his information.

Warble Fly

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what tests or experiments have been carried out in the Central Veterinary Laboratory, Weybridge, to ascertain whether cows' milk may be contaminated when organo-phosphorus compounds are applied on a dairy herd as a precaution against warble fly.

Mrs. Fenner: All veterinary medicines have to be licensed under the Medicines Act 1968. Licences are issued only after a thorough evaluation of data submitted by the applicant demonstrating the safety, quality and efficacy of the product. The assessment of safety includes the safety of the consumer of meat, milk or eggs from treated animals and of persons handling or administering the product as well as the safety of the target animal. Where necessary, the product licence specifies a withholding period between administration of the product and the taking of meat, milk or eggs for human consumption. The product licences for warble fly treatments containing organo-phosphorus compounds as the active ingredient specify a withholding period of six hours.

In view of the Medicines Act requirements, I see no need for tests to be carried out at the central veterinary laboratory.

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will list the organo-phosphorus compounds which farmers must use to comply with the regulations against warble fly.

Mrs. Fenner: The Warble Fly (England and Wales) Order 1982 provides that only systemic warble fly treatments licensed under the Medicines Act 1968 may be used for the compulsory treatment of animals.

Six products, all of which contain an organophosphorus compound as the active ingredient, are currently licensed under the Medicines Act as warble fly treatments for dairy cattle. They are:

Tiguvon (active ingredient Fenthion 2 per cent.)
Orbisect Warble Fly Liquid (active ingredient Phosmet (prolate) 13·3 per cent.)
Dermol (active ingredient Phosmet (prolate) 13·3 per cent.)
Warbexol (active ingredient Famphur 12·5 per cent.)
Cooper Warble Fly Liquid (active ingredient Phosmet (prolate) 13·3 per cent.)
Young's Poron 20 (active ingredient Phosmet (prolate) 20 per cent.)

Some of these products are also marketed under alternative names.

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has investigated the use of the Derris compound in other countries for the eradication of warble fly.

Mrs. Fenner: A number of countries, including other member states of the Community, the United States of America and Canada, undertake measures to control warble fly. All utilise systemic treatments similar to the ones used in this country. Derris is incompatible with our control and eradication schemes because it can only be used effectively during a short period in the year when the warble larvae have punctured the hide of an animal.

Sugar

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what subsidies were paid to sugar exporters in each European Economic Community country in each of the past five years.

Mr. MacGregor: European Community exporters receive payment of refunds from the authorities of the member state from which the export takes place. Sugar export refunds paid in each member state of the European Community over the last five years have been as follows:

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the subsidy cost in pound sterling of European Economic Community sugar exports in each of the past five years; and how much in each year was received from sugar beet levy to offset these costs.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is set out in the table:

Aspartame

Mr. Dykes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he proposes to request the Food Additives Contaminants Committee to review the use of aspartame in aqueous solutions.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave him on 29 November 1984, at column 590.

Milk

Mr. Speller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate how many litres of milk production will be available for redistribution as secondary quota if larger producers, who originally applied for the outgoers scheme, are now allowed to participate.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 27]: If all producers who wish to join the outgoers scheme were allowed to do so, the total amount of quota becoming available in England and Wales might be of the order of 350 million to 400 million litres—compared with the current objective of 289 million litres—depending upon the actual uptake rate.

Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ensure that in the event of a milk quota allocated to a farm being transferred to another farm, the information about the transfer will be made known to the public and in particular to the farming unions and to local creameries.

Mr. MacGregor: Under the Community regulations, milk quota may be transferred from one farm to another only if an appropriate amount of land is also transferred. When transfers of this nature take place, all of the parties to the transaction are required to sign a form showing the amount of land and quota transferred. This form is then sent to the Milk Marketing Board so that the register of quotas can be updated. This register will not be complete until the processes to establish producers' final quotas have been finalised. It will then be available for inspection only by people with an interest in the holding concerned.

Butter (Intervention Stores)

Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the volume of butter from each member state of the EEC which has gone into intervention during the most recent 12-month period for which the information is available.

Mr. MacGregor: In the period December 1983 to November 1984 the following quantities of butter from each member state of the EEC have been entered into intervention:

	Tonnes
Belgium	15,147
Denmark	—
Germany	188,954
Greece	—
France	99,826
Ireland	38,696
Italy	785
Luxembourg	758
Netherlands	89,619
United Kingdom	75,341

EC Agriculture (Financial Guidelines)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why it is necessary for the Government to press for effective application of the financial guidelines for EEC agriculture; which member states are likely to resist such effective application; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: It is the Government's usual practice to press in the European Community for policies they wish to see implemented. The Council of Ministers unanimously agreed conclusions on budgetary discipline in December and all member states have to work within the framework of agreed Community policies.

Veterinary Investigation Laboratories, Itchen Abbas

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will reconsider his decision to close the veterinary investigation laboratories at Itchen Abbas, Hampshire.

Mr. Jopling: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) on 6 December 1984.

Ministerial Visit (Caribbean)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make a statement on discussions between the Parliamentary Secretary the hon. Member for Medway (Mrs. Fenner) and representations of banana-producing countries in the course of her visit;

(2) if, in the course of her discussions on her visit to banana-producing countries in the Caribbean, the Parliamentary Secretary the hon. Member for Medway (Mrs. Fenner) took any steps to establish the difference between the price paid to producers for bananas and the retail price charged in Britain.

Mr. Jopling: The Parliamentary Secretary will be meeting Prime Ministers and Ministers of Agriculture in the Windward Islands and Jamaica to review progress towards meeting agreed objectives on quality. The discussions will not be concerned with the commercial relations between the supplying countries and their distributors in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the individuals who are accompanying the hon. Member for Medway (Mrs. Fenner) on her official visit to banana-producing countries.

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Secretary is accompanied by Mr. Fenner, by the head of the Ministry's tropical food division and her private secretary.

Bananas

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the work of the banana quality monitoring committee.

Mr. Jopling: Joint monitoring committees on banana quality were established with the Windward Islands and Jamaica in November 1983 to oversee agreed programmes for improvements in the quality of bananas exported to the United Kingdom. The committees meet periodically to review progress and to decide on any additional measures that may be necessary.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantity of bananas was imported into the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Jopling: The information requested is as follows:

Imports of bananas (including plantains)

	Quantity (tonnes)
1980	322,481
1981	328,045
1982	327,876
1983	307,169
1984	*†317,348

(Source: Customs and Excise.)
* Estimate.
† Actual imports to November inclusive 292,239.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the principal sources of bananas for the British market.

Mr. Jopling: The principal sources are the Windward Islands, Colombia, Surinam, Jamaica, Ecuador and Panama.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the policy of the Government on the importation and consumption of bananas.

Mr. Jopling: Her Majesty's Government have a long-standing commitment to provide preferential access for the whole of the exportable surplus of bananas from Jamaica and the Windward Islands. This reflects the critical importance, in particular to the Windward Islands, of their banana exports to the United Kingdom, which provide the major element of both their exports earnings and their employment.

Imports from other ACP countries have access duty-free and without restriction. Bananas from other sources are imported under licence to meet the balance of market requirements. The results of a review of the Government's policy in this respect were announced by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) in his reply to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) on 15 November 1984 at column 305.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Board and Lodging Payments

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will ensure that in any changes to board and lodging payments by his Department adequate flexibility is maintained to reflect the variations from area to area and from season to season in the list of board and lodging and that a mechanism is retained to consider appeals by persons familiar with local circumstances.

Mr. Whitney: Our proposals for changes to the present system of board and lodging payments were put to the Social Security Advisory Committee in November last year for consultation. Before finalising our proposals, we shall be considering fully its own views and all the representations made to it, including any which deal with the issues raised by the hon. Member.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many submissions have been made to the Social Security Advisory Committee regarding his recent proposals on board and lodgings allowances; what categories of persons or bodies have made such submissions; and how many submissions have been made by each.

Mr. Whitney: Over 500 submissions have been received by 25 January 1985. These fell within the following main categories:

1. Local authority associations and individual local authorities.
2. Voluntary organisations concerned with the homeless, young people, the elderly, handicapped and disabled people, the mentally-ill, alcohol and drug abusers, and ex-offenders.
3. Individual housing associations, hostels and housing trusts and associations representing them.
4. Housing advice and information centres.
5. Claimants' rights organisations.
6. Women's aid organisations and refuges.
7. Church organisations.
8. Residential and nursing home proprietors.
9. Organisations representing residential and nursing homes.
10. Professional bodies.

In addition, representations were received from a number of individuals. I regret that a detailed breakdown of the number of representations in each category is not readily available.

Residential Accommodation

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department's review of local authority building note No. 2 on "Residential Accommodation for Elderly People (1973)" has yet been completed.

Mr. John Patten: We think it is more helpful to local authorities for guidance to be set out in a more informal and flexible style than that of the building notes, and future guidance will be in the form of pamphlets which set out the variety of options open to authorities in the design of their services. The 1973 building note will not, therefore, be updated; work on a replacement is still at a comparatively early stage.

Infant Mortality

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report, as soon as it is available to him, the infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births for 1984 in (a) England, (b) Japan, (c) France, (d) Finland and (e) Sweden.

Mr. John Patten: Yes. Figures for England and France are expected to be available in the spring of 1985. However, data for the last remaining countries may not be received until late 1986.

Ambulances

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he proposes to issue guidelines to health authorities about the use of stretchers on secondary suspension systems for ambulances to avoid aggravation of injury through vibration on the way to hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: It is for each health authority, advised by the relevant chief ambulance officer, to determine the equipment appropriate for use by the ambulance service locally.

NHS (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the charges determined under section 66 of the National Health Service Act 1977 reflect the full costs borne by health authorities in providing the services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 21 January, at column 342.

Tendering

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will name, for each tendering exercise of which his Department is aware and which was completed since the last named in his answer of 30 November 1984, Official Report, columns 623-24, the health authority and the hospital concerned and the successful tenderer.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are aware of the following additional cases:

Health Authority	Hospital	Contractor or In-House
Domestic
Bury	Bealey	ISS
Laundry
Cheltenham	—	Gloucester HA
Dewsbury	—	Express Cleaners
Gloucester	—	In-House
Newcastle	—	Co-op
Plymouth	—	In-House
Somerset	—	In-House
Catering
Bury	Florence Nightingale	In-House
Scunthorpe	Various Hospitals	In-House

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures for the savings achieved in relation to the eight contracted-out services referred to in his Department's press release 84/50 on health service tendering.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as we can obtain up-to-date information.

Fluoride

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the sources of any evidence available to his Department of the upper limit of consumption of fluoride before (a) the teeth begin to discolour through mottling and (b) harm to health may begin to result;

(2) if he will list the sources of any evidence available to his Department of the degree of mottling of children and young persons' teeth from water fluoridated naturally or artifically to one part per million;

(3) if he will list the sources of any evidence available to his Department of the effect of a high concentration of magnesium and calcium in water containing natural fluoride at levels at or above one part per million.

Mr. John Patten: The question of dental mottling was studied in the United States of America before the introduction of public water fluoridation. It was found that at a concentration of fluoride of about two parts per million an increasing proportion of children had mottled enamel that was apparent and objectionable aesthetically (Dean HT and Elvolve E "Further studies on the minimal threshold of chronic endemic dental fluorosis" — Pub Health Rep 52: 1249-64 10 September 1937).

There have been a number of studies contrasting the prevalence of dental mottling, which may have various causes, in comparable fluoridated and non-fluoridated areas. A review of the evidence is, for example, contained in pages 349-354 of Lord Jauncey's opinion in the Strathclyde fluoridation case.

Lord Jauncey concluded that "if the drinking water in Strathclyde is fluoridated to one part per million there is likely to be a very small increase in the prevalence of mottling of a type which will only be noticeable at very close quarters and which is very unlikely to create any aesthetic problems for the owners of the teeth".

On the issue of harm to health, there is a substantial body of evidence which shows that levels of consumption associated with fluoride in drinking water considerably above the optimum level of one part per million are not associated with skeletal fluorosis in temperate countries. Published reviews of the evidence include the following:

Fluorides and Human Health (World Health Organisation, Geneva 1970).

Fluoride, Teeth and Health (a Report from the Royal College of Physicians of London, 1976).

Drinking Water and Health (National Academy of Sciences, Washington, 1977).

Victorian Water Supplies (Melbourne, 1980).

We know of no reputable evidence that a high concentration of magnesium and/or calcium makes any difference to the benefit to dental health obtained from drinking water containing natural fluoride at a concentration of around one part per million. Conversely the efficacy of fluoride has been demonstrated in this respect including areas where it has been artifically added to water with low concentrations of either magnesium and/or calcium.

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he is proposing to issue of (a) toothpaste with fluoride, (b) fluoride tablets, (c) dentists applying topical fluoride and (d) users of kidney dialysis machines following the enactment of the Water (Fluoridation) Bill.

Mr. John Patten: No guidance will be needed on any of these issues. Topical fluoride may be safely applied in either fluoridated or non-fluoridated areas. We are currently issuing guidance to the Health Service on the exposure to aluminium and fluoride of patients undergoing haemodialysis. For the position with regard to fluoridated toothpaste and fluoride tablets, I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him of 13 November 1984 at column 217.

Prescribed Medicines

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the National Health Service budget was represented by the cost of prescribed medicines in 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the prescriptions issued during the latest period of 12 months for which figures are available were of medicines listed in the "Monthly Index of Medical Specialties."

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average number of prescriptions issued for each registered National Health Service patient during the latest period of 12 months for which figures are available; and what were the comparative figures in the other member countries of the European Community.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The average number of prescriptions dispensed to each patient registered on a doctor's National Health Service list in 1983 was 6·8. We do not have available the comparative figures in other member countries of the European Community.

Surgery Closures

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the criteria that have to be satisfied for a general practice to close a surgery.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A doctor must obtain the approval of the family practitioner committee or, on appeal, the Secretary of State, to the places where he is available for consultation and to any changes in them. Such approval may not unreasonably be withheld but may be given subject to such conditions as seem necessary to enable the doctor to carry out his obligations under his terms of service. In considering a proposed change we would expect a committee to have regard to the views of patients and the general public.

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish his circular on family practitioner committees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the population of England and Wales is covered by comprehensive computerised age/sex registers of family practitioner committees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Approximately one in five.

Milk and Welfare Foods (Entitlement)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he plans to end entitlement to free milk and free welfare foods to pregnant and nursing mothers.

Mr. Newton: We have no present plans to do so; but the current social security review is of course looking at the provision for maternity needs, and families with children, generally.

Health Authorities (Funding)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) in how many cases there has been a change of use, from standardised mandatory ratios to social deprivation factors, as the criterion in resource allocation working party allocations of health funding to health authorities; in how many cases such authorities gained extra funding; and in how many cases they lost funding;

(2) in how many cases the resource allocation working party criteria for analysing resource levels have been changed from standardised mortality ratios to social deprivation factors; what has been the change in funding allocation in each health authority case so affected; how many health authorities have gained and how many lost as a result; what appeals have been made against such reassessments; and with what results.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our method of calculating regional target allocations when we are making decisions about the allocation of resources to regional health authorities follows the recommendations of the resource allocation working party (RAWP). We have not changed our practice of using standardised mortality ratios.

Regions follow the broad principles set out by RAWP in calculating their district target allocations, but they also take account of local factors. I understand that at least one regional health authority includes information about social deprivation in calculating district target allocations. In making allocations to districts, RHAs have regard to their strategic objectives including progress towards equality of access to health services for patients according to clinical need which is the prime aim of the RAWP philosophy. So the method of calculating the target need not itself have an effect on the allocation to a health authority. We do not collect information centrally about district health authorities' appeals to RHAs against the method of calculating their target allocations and/or the amount of allocations actually made, nor about the outcome of any such appeals.

It would be a mistake to devote too much attention to the intricate technical details of a formula which is used as an important factor, but not the only factor, in allocating resources according to the plans and needs of the service and its patients.

Drugs (Safety)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that sufficient information is available to the public on the safety and side effects of drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes, but if my hon. Friend has any specific problems in mind perhaps he would let me know.

Departmental Staff (Assaults)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of assault on his Department's local staff have been reported to him; what is the principal form such attacks take; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The number of incidents reported were as follows:

	Number
1978	212
1979	187
1980	195
1981	192
1982	219
1983	199
1984	198

The principal forms that such incidents took in 1983, the latest year for which full details are currently available, were:

	Per cent.
Technical assault	31
Blow with fist	20
All other types of manual assault	42

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures he has taken or what measures he proposes to take to protect his Department's local staff from assault; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: All local office staff in the Department are advised concerning the possible risk of assault in the course of their duties. Staff who visit claimants in their homes receive advice on dealing with potentially violent situations as part of their training.

Where appropriate, protective screens are installed in public areas at the Department's local offices.

Arrangements to alert staff to situations or cases which have been identified as potentially dangerous are under review to see if they can be improved.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the £100 million estimated savings from his original limited drugs list was expected to result from generic substitution.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There is no, and never was any, element of generic substitution in the limited list proposals we announced on 8 November 1984.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the £100 million estimated savings from his original limited drugs list was expected to come from the £120 million presently spent on propriety brands dispensed to a prescription category; and what will come from the £40 million presently spent on the sedative category.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 5 December 1984 to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) at columns 219-20.

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the members of the panel he has appointed to assist the Chief Medical Officer in advising on the drugs that should be included in his proposed limited list for prescription under the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our chief medical officer has invited a number of eminent individuals from relevant branches of the medical and pharmaceutical professions to advise him on the content of the limited list. They are Professor Alasdair Breckenridge, professor of clinical pharmacology; Professor David Morrell, professor of general practice; Dr. John Tomlinson, general practitioner; Dr. Duncan Colin Jones, consultant physician; Professor Eric Stroud, professor of child health; Professor Malcolm Hodkinson, professor of geriatric medicine; Mr. David Coleman, retail pharmacist.

The chief medical officer has invited Professor Malcolm Lader to advise on the psychiatric implications of the list. He may also wish to involve other specialists on particular points.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration has been given to enabling patients, preferring branded drugs which may no longer be available on prescription, from having that part of the cost of the generic substitute allowed against the cost of the branded product.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Doctors will be able to prescribe at National Health Service expense from a limited but adequate range of drugs in those categories covered by our limited list proposals. If a patient elects to have a private prescription instead, that will be a matter of choice not of medical necessity. There is no question of our subsidising this choice.

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations have been made by organisations representing the elderly on the proposals to limit drugs available to National Health Service patients on prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received representations from a wide range of individuals and organisations, including some which cite the needs of the elderly. We are carefully considering all these views.

Human Embryos

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make available in the Library copies of any representations he has recently received concerning the formation of a non-statutory body to monitor experimentation upon human embryos.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes, on the same terms as indicated in the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) on 21 January at column 344.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any intention of endorsing the setting up of a non-statutory body to monitor experimentation upon human embryos.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are following with interest the proposals being made for such a body but the Government have not been involved in them. We are still considering the public and parliamentary reactions to the Warnock inquiry.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has had any discussions with the Medical Research Council concerning the formation of a non-statutory monitoring body for experimentation upon human embryos until such time as legislation is enacted by Parliament on this subject.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Medical Research Council has informed me of its proposals for voluntary arrangements to monitor research using human embryos.

Croydon District Health Authority

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why, for the purposes of determining the eligibility of the Croydon district health authority for additional financial assistance under the resource allocation working party criteria, a shift has been made from the use of standardised mortality ratios as a yardstick to the use of social deprivation factors; what assessment was made before this shift was made of its implications for the level of resources available to the Croydon district health authority vis-a-vis other comparable district health authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The allocation of resources to district health authorities is a matter for the regional health authority to determine. I understand that relative social deprivation is only one of a number of factors which the South-West Thames regional heath authority takes into account in its resource allocation policy.

Abortion

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many abortions were performed on residents and non-residents at up to 12 weeks gestation, 13 to 20 weeks gestation, 20 to 23 weeks gestation and 24 weeks and over for each year since 1968; on what grounds these were performed; what ages the women were; and how many were performed in the National Health Service and how many were performed in other approved places, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the number of abortions performed in England and Wales to resident girls aged 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 years (a) with parental consent and (b) without parental consent for each of the years from 1968 to 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect information about parental consent in each case. The available figures are shown in the table.

Numbers of Legal Abortions: Girls aged 11 to 16, 1968-83
England and Wales Residents

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what instructions he has issued to health authorities about changes in the compilation of hospital waiting list figures; from when the changes will be operative; what estimate he has made of the likely percentage differences the changes will make to waiting list totals; and whether he proposes to reissue published waiting list figures adjusted to match the new figures.

Mr. John Patten: Health authorities have not been asked to change the methods by which they compile waiting lists, but to review them to improve their accuracy.

Doctors (Benefit Claims)

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the terms and conditions of service of a general practitioner require him to give information to his Department in connection with claims for benefit designed to allow claimants to maintain their health, such as dietary additions to supplementary benefit; and what fee is chargeable for this service if he has the consent of the patient to do so (a) to the patient and (b) to his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A doctor is required by his terms of service to issue to his patients or their personal representatives free of charge a medical certificate required to support such a claim.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements are made for dialysing psychiatrically-disturbed patients other than sending them to a kidney unit in a general hospital.

Mr. John Patten: Patients referred for haemodialysis normally spend an initial period in a renal unit in a general hospital and thereafter may continue to be treated in the renal unit or may dialyse either at home or in a satellite unit. The participation of relatives or friends is encouraged. Whether special arrangements are made for psychiatrically disturbed patients is a matter for the health authorities concerned following the clinical advice of the relevant consultants.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what increases in spending on the installation of kidney dialysis he anticipates over the next five years.

Mr. John Patten: It is for health authorities to decide what proportion of the resources available to them is to be allocated to the provision of a particular service. My right hon. Friend has, however, asked health authorities to develop services for patients suffering end stage renal failure as a priority within the acute sector, and all regional health authorities have recently agreed to increase the annual acceptance rate of new renal patients to at least 40 per million population by 1987. The extent of the increase in expenditure on dialysis in the next five years will depend upon the way in which individual health authorities organise their services and on the balance between dialysis and transplantation.

In the first nine months following the launch of our donor card campaign in February 1984, the number of transplants rose 35 per cent. (to 1129) compared with the same period in the previous year.

Ophthalmic Services

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost saving to the National Health Service if the supply, repair and replacement of general ophthalmic service spectacles is restricted to children aged under 16, full-time students aged under 19, people on certain benefits and low income, and people who require complex lenses, as under amended regulations proposed by the Government.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The anticipated full year effect for England of the Government's measures to limit the supply, repair and replacement of glasses in 1985-86 is expected to be £14 million.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the cost saving to the National Health Service if the full assessed charge is payable by patients who require lenses over six dioptres cylindrical power, or over 10 dioptres spherical and over four dioptres cylindrical power, or lenticular;

(2) how many spectacles, on an annual basis, are prescribed in the categories with one or more lens over six dioptres cylindrical power, over 10 dioptres spherical and over four dioptres cylindrical power, or lenticular;

(3) what percentage of the total number of annual prescriptions is represented by the categories defined as complex in amended regulations proposed by the Government;

(4) how many cases involving complex lenses, as defined in the Government's planned amendments to the general ophthalmic service, are dealt with (a) by the hospital eye service and (b) the general ophthalmic service, on an annual basis.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many prescriptions for glasses have been issued in each of the last three years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In England the number of prescriptions issued following sight tests under the general opthalmic service were as follows:

1983	6,671,836
1982	6,413,522
1981	6,273,033

Supplementary Benefit Appeals

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Chief Adjudication Officer has considered the findings of the supplementary benefits appeal tribunal in the cases of Mr. Roderick Skinner and Ms. Isobel Rafferty in August 1984; and what conclusions he reached.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that the Chief Adjudication Officer has considered the case of Mr. Roderick Skinner but not that of Ms. Isobel Rafferty. In the former case it was decided, in the circumstances of this particular case, not to appeal against the decision to the social security commissioner.

Fuel Bills

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates will be the average payments for help with fuel bills in exceptionally severe weather for claimants in the areas of England and Wales which have qualified for assistance.

Mr. Whitney: Information is not yet available to estimate the average payment for help with fuel bills in the areas of England and Wales affected by the recent exceptionally severe weather. The method of calculating amounts payable in respect of extra fuel costs arising from exceptionally severe weather is explained in the Chief Adjudication Officer's published guidance — in paragraphs 7426-7459 and appendix 19 of the S Manual, a copy of which is in the Library. Where the period covered by a fuel bill includes a period of exceptionally severe weather, then the temperatures over the whole period of the bill are compared with the mean temperatures for that time of year. If the whole period is colder than average, then claimants eligible for payments receive help with a proportion of their fuel bills depending on how far temperatures over the whole period have fallen below the mean. Average amounts paid will, therefore, depend on temperatures over the coming weeks and on the size of claimants' fuel bills.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the best available estimate of the total amount of public expenditure expected to be saved in the current financial year as a result of the reduction in parents' entitlement to housing benefit when their working children are living at home introduced in April 1984; and whether he will now abolish the reductions.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated saving from the increase in the non-dependant deductions for 18 to 20-year-olds in the housing benefit and supplementary benefit schemes from April 1984 is £11 million in the current financial year. The future of non-dependant deductions will be part of our considerations following the social security reviews.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the best available estimate of the number of young people made homeless as a result of the reduction in parents' entitlement to housing benefit when working children are living at home, introduced in April 1984.

Mr. Whitney: We have no evidence that any working children living in their parents' household have been made homeless as a direct result of the increase in the housing benefit non-dependant deductions in April 1984.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what research was conducted by his Department into the likely effects of the reductions in the entitlement to housing benefit of families whose children are working, introduced in April 1984; before the introduction of the reductions; what research into the actual effects has since been conducted; what research into the effects is now planned; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: In relation to wage levels, the contributions to housing costs expected from young people in work are not excessive. No research has been conducted by the Department into the likely effects of non-dependent deductions, and there are no immediate plans to commission research in this area.

Benefit Claimants (Criminal Records)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what national or regional guidelines have been issued regarding access to criminal records by officials of his Department concerning social security claimants; on how many occasions in each region of the United Kingdom in each year since 1970 such access has been used; what has been the purpose of seeking access to such records; if access has depended on the discretion of chief police officers; and how many claimants in each region in each year have been denied benefit as a result.

Mr. Newton: No guidelines have been issued to officials regarding access to criminal records of social security claimants since such information has no bearing on benefit entitlement. However, the investigation of serious, organised crime which relates to social security matters and which involves considerable sums of money is pursued in close liaison with the police. For example, in a recent case, an offender was sent to prison for 5½ years for manipulation of stolen order books with a potential value of over £70,000.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Interest Relief

Mr. Craigen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average interest relief on tax given to first-time buyers and the latest average level of central Government support to a council house tenant.

Mr. Moore: Provisional estimates for 1984-85 are shown below. I regret that it is not possible to distinguish mortgage interest relief given to first-time buyers.

	England £	Scotland £	Wales £	Northern Ireland £
Average mortgage interest tax relief per owner occupier	270	270	150	220
Average Central Government subsidy per council tenant	88	61	34	*595
Average payment of Housing Benefit (rent rebate) per council tenant	358	271	466	378
Average Local Authority subsidy per council tenant	95	140	16	*—

* The Northern Ireland Housing Executive is the sole public housing authority in Northern Ireland. The figure is based on the average revenue deficit per NIHE dwelling.

EC Budget

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the final result of discussions between the EEC Council and the European Assembly about the draft 1985 Budget.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The European Parliament voted on 13 December 1984 by 390 votes to 5 to reject the 1985 draft budget. Consequently since 1 January the finances of the Community have been governed by the provisional twelfths regime.

No new draft budget has yet been put forward by the Commission for consideration by the Council and the Parliament.

Investment

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he intends to take following the recommendation of the European Commission in its annual economic report for increased public investment in countries whose construction industry is underutilised.

Mr. Peter Rees: The Government's plans for public investment are set out in Cmnd. 9428.

National Economic Development Council

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the National Economic Development Council on 9 January.

Mr. Peter Rees: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) on 24 January, at column 1120.

Savings Certificates and Government Stock

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give instructions, where savings certificates and Government stock are purchased by a husband and wife and the appropriate certificates are in joint names, that all letters be addressed to the joint holders.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Bank of England and the Department for National Savings do not usually know or record the relationship of joint holders. The usual practice for Government stock is to address original correspondence to whichever holder's name appears first. In the very rare cases where national savings originates correspondence on savings certificates the practice is to write to the joint holders. In replying to any letter from holders the practice is to follow the form adopted by the sender—for example a joint reply to a jointly signed letter.

Civil Service (Financial Incentives)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the present financial incentives to good performance in the Civil Service; and why they are considered inadequate.

Mr. Hayhoe: In the case of industrial civil servants, there are a number of productivity schemes which encourage good performance. But for non-industrial civil servants the main form of reward for merit in the Civil Service has been the prospect of promotion to the next grade. In the vast majority of cases promotion brings a financial reward.

However, as I told the House on 5 December—columns 192 and 193—the Government believe it right to provide additional incentives to good performance. This becomes more important when numbers are falling and there are reduced opportunities for promotion. The Government are, therefore, introducing an experimental scheme of performance bonuses but, for the reasons which I gave the House on 5 December, performance-related pay cannot be introduced immediately across the whole of the Civil Service.

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what interest rate is charged to the EEC when own resources payments are made in advance of the due date at the request of the EEC Commission.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Interest is not charged on the sums advanced to the European Community in respect of own resources payments. Since the EEC Commission's funds are derived directly from member states' contributions any interest they charged the Commission for making such advances would eventually have to be borne by them.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Churchill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what have been the changes in public expenditure in each year since 1978-79 to date; and what is his forecast for those years for which figures are available expressed both in constant prices and as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Board of Inland Revenue

Mr. Trotter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider appointing lay members with commercial experience to the Board of Inland Revenue.

Mr. Moore: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he estimates would be the full-year revenue raised on the following supplies if they were rated at 5 per cent. for value added tax purpose: (a) those goods and services listed in the European Commission's reasoned opinion on United Kingdom zero rates, (b) newspaper cover prices, (c) books, (d) fuel and power, (e) children's clothes and footwear and (f) all supplies at present zero-rated.

Mr. Hayhoe: The estimates of net additional revenue in a full year at 1984-85 prices are:

	£ million
(a) Those goods and services listed in the European Commission's reasoned opinion on United Kingdom zero rates	115
(b) Newspaper cover prices	80
(c) Books	30
(d) Fuel and power	470
(e) Children's clothing and footwear	90
(f) All supplies at present zero-rated (excluding exports and international services)	2,270

Capital Transfer Tax

Mr. Cormack asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the yield from capital transfer tax in 1983-84.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Married Man's Allowance

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many couples claimed the married man's allowance in each of the last five fiscal years for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1985, c. 121]: Estimates based on the surveys of personal income for the years concerned are shown below. The figures exclude married couples who elected for the separate taxation of wife's earnings.

	Numbers of married couples claiming the married man's tax allowance Million
1980-81	12·7
1981-82	12·1
1982-83	12·4

Personal Tax Allowances

Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will recalculate the figures given in his answer to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on 20 December, Official Report, column 321, about personal tax allowances assuming no increase on top of indexation in the levels at which higher rates of income tax become payable.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 24 January 1985, c. 504]: The reply to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) assumed no increase on top of indexation in the levels of taxable income at which the higher rates of income tax become payable.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Orlit Houses

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Northern Ireland Housing Executive commenced its examination of the options for dealing with its stock of Orlit dwellings at (a) Comber and (b) Donaghadee.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am advised by the chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that while the future of Orlit dwellings has been under consideration since potential defects in these properties were identified in 1983, it was not possible to consider specific proposals for dealing with the Orlits at Comber and Donaghadee until December 1984 when the final results of technical assessments carried out by the Housing Executive were confirmed.

Strip Searches

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if any staff members have been reprimanded as a result of conduct during a strip search in prisons in Northern Ireland in each of the last 10 years;

(2) how many strip searches of women prisoners have taken place in the presence of one or more male prison officers in each of the past six years;

(3) what type of items which may constitute a danger to the prison system are intended to be discovered by strip searching;

(4) if he will make a statement detailing those items which have been found during a strip searching in each of the past five years;

(5) if he will make a statement on the contribution of strip searches to prison security in Northern Ireland;

(6) what study of strip searching he has made since his appointment; and what consideration he is giving to such investigations;

(7) how many strip searches have taken place in each of the Northern Ireland prisons in each of the past 10 years;

(8) how many prisoners have been subjected to strip searching in each of Northern Ireland's prisons in the past 10 years;

(9) what medical or nursing staff are required to be present during a strip search of a prisoner;

(10) at what level of authority individual strip searches are ordered or authorised;

(11) what guidelines are issued to prison staff regarding strip searches; and what sanction there is against a member of staff who breaches those guidelines;

(12) if there has been any evidence, from medical reports on prisoners, of mental, nervous or physical injuries caused by strip searching in Northern Ireland prisons;

(13) if he will order an end to strip searches in Northern Ireland;

(14) what efforts his Department is making regarding the welfare of women prisoners in Northern Ireland; and what further initiatives he proposes in this regard.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Benefits and Allowances

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to how many people living on Creggan estate, Derry, are claiming each of the various benefits and allowances administered by the Department of Health and Social Services.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is not readily available, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pluralist Society

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether it is Government policy to encourage the continuance of a pluralist society in those parts of Northern Ireland where it presently exists.

Mr. Hurd: The Government will continue to protect the right of the constituent groups in Northern Ireland to uphold and give expression, within the law, to their distinctive views on religious, cultural and other social questions.

Security

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take the necessary steps to sustain the full fabric of its society for the Protestant community in areas close to the frontier with the Irish Republic where the Irish Republican Army's campaign to murder Protestants has disadvantaged it.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will ensure that necessary extra resources, including teachers, are made available in controlled primary and secondary schools serving communities close to the frontier with the Irish Republic which have been disadvantaged by the Irish Republican Army's murder campaign against Protestants.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Farmers

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has recently considered how farmers, who were living close to the frontier with the Irish Republic and were forced by Irish Republican Army activity to abandon their holdings in the mid-1970s, can now be compensated for loss of earnings in the same way as other businesses were at that time;

(2) if he has any plans to assist farmers, who were displaced by Irish Republican Army activity from their holdings close to the frontier with the Irish Republic, to return to their properties; and whether he believes their safety can now reasonably be assured.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

A-level Curriculum

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what are the criteria used by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland when deciding whether or not to approve arrangements for the provision of an A-level curriculum in schools in Northern Ireland;

(2) if he will list the number of A-level students in (a) Inniskillen collegiate school, (b) Fivemiletown high school and (c) Portora royal school during (i) 1983-84, (ii) 1984-85 and (iii) the projected figures for 1985-86;

(3) if he will list the subjects offered at A-level and the number of students taking each subject in (a) Inniskillen collegiate school, (b) Fivemiletown high school and (c) Portora royal school during (i) 1983-84, (ii) 1984-85 and (iii) the projected figures for 1985-86;

(4) under what circumstances the Department of Education for Northern Ireland has approved the provision of an A-level curriculum in Northern Ireland schools where there are only two, three or four students per subject; and if he will now agree to extend such approval to any secondary schools which make such a request and will provide adequate extra staff for this purpose.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the number of cases in which persons were convicted of scheduled offences in Northern Ireland in 1984 on the basis of evidence given by accomplices on behalf of the Crown in which evidence, other than of the accomplice, either forensic, from other non-supergrass witnesses or by an admission of guilt from the accused, was used to obtain the conviction;

(2) how many people were convicted in 1984, either on their own admission of guilt or following a plea of not guilty, on the basis of evidence given by accomplices on behalf of the Crown in cases concerning scheduled offences in Northern Ireland; how many suspects arrested on the basis of such evidence have been released as a result of the retraction of evidence given by accomplices; and how many people are presently awaiting trial as a result of evidence obtained from terrorist accomplices.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Remanded Persons

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the average period of remand without bail in each of the following cases involving accomplice witness's evidence or (a) persons convicted, (b) persons acquitted and (c) persons who were released as a result of such evidence being retracted; and how these figures compare with those for persons charged with scheduled offences on the basis of evidence other than accomplice evidence;

(2) for each year since 1980, what is the number of prisoners refused bail; and what is the average period of remand without bail for persons accused and charged wholly or partially on the basis of accomplice evidence in each of the following categories: (a) the top decile of prisoners awaiting trial for the longest period, (b) the top quartile of prisoners awaiting trial for the longest period and (c) the second quartile of prisoners awaiting trial for the longest period; and what is the average period of remand for all prisoners charged on the basis of such evidence;

(3) how many prisoners in 1984 were remanded in custody prior to trial for periods between (a) nought to three months, (b) three to six months, (c) six to nine months, (d) nine to 12 months, (e) 12 to 18 months and (f) over 18 months for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Housing Executive (Tenancies)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons with addresses in the Irish Republic have been granted the tenancy of Housing Executive dwellings in Northern Ireland in each of the last three years.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 22 January 1985, c. 390]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. However, I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The information which is available was collected for the year 1983-84 only and relates to external applicants generally — that is, those with addresses anywhere outside Northern Ireland—and is as follows:

Period	Number of external applicants housed from the waiting list	Number of external applicants housed from the transfer list (i.e., those previously living in public authority housing elsewhere)
Year ending 31 March 1984	129	38

In addition, there were 1,135 external applicants—including transfer applications—on the waiting list at 30 September 1984.

Shooting Incident (Belfast)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received concerning the shooting incident in Belfast on 14 January involving the Ulster Defence Regiment.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 24 January 1985, c. 520]: Representations have been made by the Government of the Republic of Ireland and by two local political parties.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will call for an inquiry into the shooting of Paul Gerard Kelly on 14 January in Belfast;

(2) if he will make a statement on the shooting in Belfast by members of the Ulster Defence Regiment on 14 January.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 24 January 1985, c. 520]: The incident in the early hours of 15 January, in which Mr. Kelly lost his life, is being investigated by the Royal Ulster Constabulary. In due course its papers will be submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who will decide if any one of the Ulster Defence Regiment soldiers involved should be prosecuted. While this process is in hand, it would be wrong for me to comment on the incident, but I have no reason to think that any useful purpose would be served by a separate inquiry.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Ministerial Visit (Caribbean)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated cost to his Department of the visit of the hon. Member for Medway (Mrs. Fenner) and her party to banana-producing countries in the Caribbean.

Mr. Jopling: The cost to my Department of the visit of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary and her party to banana-producing countries in the Caribbean is expected to be about £13,500. The precise cost will not be known until the party returns.

Agricultural Expenditure

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food by what percentage agricultural expenditure has increased in the European Economic Community for each year since 1970.

Mr. Jopling: Annual percentage changes in EC agricultural expenditure from 1970 to 1984 have been as follows:

	Per cent.
*1970-71	+21
*1971-72	−13
*1972-73	+33
1973-74	−15
1974-75	+46
1975-76	+23
1976-77	+23
1977-78	+26
1978-79	+21
1979-80	+10
1980-81	−2
1981-82	+11
1982-83	+28
1983-84	(estimate)

* The current system of charging EAGGF guarantee expenditure to particular years was introduced by the financial regulation of 7 November 1972. To achieve comparability the percentage changes for earlier years have been shown as though the current system applied for the whole period.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

African Countries

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, pursuant to the Answer to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton on 22 January, Official Report, column 384, he will now give whatever statistical information is available to him about the financial help given by the countries listed in that question to African countries in need; and which were the countries assisted.

Mr. Raison: Detailed information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Amateur Radio Licence

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if the amateur radio licence issuing department has been fully computerised;

(2) what representations he has had from the Radio Society of Great Britain in relation to the introduction of a novice amateur radio licence;

(3) when he expects to introduce a novice amateur radio licence.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Pharmaceutical Products (Exports-Imports)

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the cost of pharmaceutical imports, and the value of pharmaceutical exports, during 1983.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c.46]: In 1983, United Kingdom imports of medicinal and pharmaceutical products were valued at £470 million (cif) while exports were valued at £1,073 million (fob).

Artificial Sweetners

Dr. Mark Hughes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any of the artificial sweeteners which have been approved in the United Kingdom had been tested by the Industrial Bio Test Laboratories in Chicago, United States of America.

Mr. John Patten: I have been asked to reply.

Studies by the Industrial Bio Test Laboratories were considered in respect of one artificial sweetener now permitted in the United Kingdom, namely hydrogenated glucose syrup. Of the two studies performed by IBT and reported in 1969 which are relevant to the safety evaluation of this sweetener, one has been repeated and confirmed by an independent laboratory while the other has been verified following audit by the Food and Drug Administration in the United States.

PRIME MINISTER

Hyndburn

Q46. Mr. Hargreaves asked the Prime Minister when she next intends to pay an official visit to Hyndburn.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

East Anglia

Q71. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit east Anglia in 1985.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Channel Tunnel

Q85. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister when the joint Anglo-French working group on guidance for prospective promoters of a Channel tunnel project is expected to complete its work; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: At my meeting with the French President on 30 November 1984 we agreed that the joint working group should pursue its work with real urgency and submit its report within three months. I have nothing to add to the joint statement we made on that occasion, in which we welcomed and endorsed the terms of the communiqué issued on 15 November 1984 by the Transport Ministers of the two countries.

Caernarfon

Q92. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister what plans she has to visit Caernarfon.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 29 January.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Ministerial Cars (Drivers' Instructions)

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister if she will give details of the instructions given to drivers of ministerial cars that are not related to security.

The Prime Minister: As these instructions are fairly extensive, I am arranging for a copy to be sent to the hon. Member direct.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what would be (a) the loss of revenue if income tax thresholds and national insurance thresholds were raised to £3,250 for a single person and £4,250 for a married couple and additional tax allowances of £780 were given for each child and (b) the saving in expenditure if all benefits, including family income supplement, child benefit and all housing benefits and tax allowances were abolished; and what would be the net weekly spending power of a man with two children earning £110 per week with a rent of £25 and rates of £5 per week: (i) now and (ii) assuming all these changes have been made simultaneously.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 28 January 1985, c. 26]: (a) The cost of increasing the single person's income tax allowance to £3,250, the married man's allowance to £4,250 and of introducing child tax allowances of £780 per child would be about £10 billion in a full year at 1984-85 levels of income. The reduction in national insurance contributions if the lower earnings limit was raised to £3,250 per year for single people and to £4,250 per year for married couples, in relation to their joint earnings, would be about £1·25 billion in 1984-85. This estimate assumes no change in the contracted-out rebate in respect of people remaining liable to contributions.

(b) If all benefits including those paid to people not in work were abolished, the annual saving in expenditure in 1984-85 would be £38 billion. If, in addition to the changes in (a), tax relief for mortgage interest relief was withdrawn, there would be an increase in revenue of about £3 billion in a full year.

On the stated assumptions, a married man with two children would currently have a net weekly spending power of £78·49 (based on the general assumptions in the November 1984 DHSS tax and benefit model tables). After the changes specified in (a) and (b) above, his net weekly spending power would become £62·95.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Firearms and Shotguns

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received urging tighter control for the issue of shotgun certificates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have received representations from various sources, including hon. Members, local authority associations, local authorities and police authorities, and members of the public. In 1984 these numbered approximately 50. The majority suggested that the controls which at present apply to pistols and rifles should be applied to shotguns. On that issue, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend, the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) on 22 November 1984 at column 246.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total cost of administering the firearm and shotgun licensing system, annually, at the latest available date and five years ago.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Annual figures of costs and income are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Surveys to provide such information were conducted in sample police forces in 1979 and 1981 from which it was estimated that in 1979-80 the total costs were £5,000,000 and the income £3,700,000; and in 1981-82 £5,398,707 and £4,376,631 respectively.

Off-course Betting Shops

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the most likely effect on attendance at race tracks and consequently on the level of betting and payment of on-course betting tax that will arise from the provision of better facilities at off-course betting shops.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We intend to issue a consultation document soon about the facilities permitted within betting shops. Before reaching any decisions we shall take account of views expressed about the effect of better facilities on attendances at racecourses as well as a number of other considerations.

Metropolitan Police (Out-of-Court Settlements)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the amounts paid in out-of-court settlements of claims arising from the wrongful acts of Metropolitan police officers in 1983, the amounts paid under awards made by courts in similar cases in 1983, the number of cases initiated in 1983 and the number concluded in 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The total amount paid in 1983 by Metropolitan police in settlement of claims arising from allegations of misconduct by police officers (whether or not formal proceedings were instituted) was £57,455. The total amount paid by the force under awards made by the courts in similar cases during 1983 was £5,855. The number of such civil actions initiated against the force during 1983 was 135, and the number disposed of was 83.

Prevention of Terrorism

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained in west Yorkshire under the Prevention of Terrorism Act in 1982, 1983 and 1984; and how many of these were subsequently convicted of criminal offences.

Mr. Brittan: One person, who was not subsequently charged, was detained in west Yorkshire under the Prevention of Terrorism Act in 1982. No such detentions were recorded in 1983 or 1984.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many persons have been arrested on Merseyside under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act to the latest available date; how many were subsequently (a) charged and (b) convicted; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many persons have been detained in England and Wales under the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act to the most recent available date; and how many were (a) charged and (b) convicted.

Mr. Brittan [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 14]: The available information for England and for Merseyside on persons detained under the Prevention of Terrorism Acts and subsequently charged relates only to the period from 1 January 1979. From that date up to 30 September 1984, of 328 subsequently charged in England and Wales 248 had been found guilty and of 24 subsequently charged on Merseyside 21 had been found guilty.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, after the revision of the Metropolitan police organisation, described in the police press release of 20 November 1984, it is the intention that each of the borough-based consultative groups will have, as their main police links, several chief superintendents of equal authority and status representing each of the divisions within the borough, instead of the single district commander as at present; and how it is envisaged they will tackle problems of police/community relationships that cross division boundaries.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The precise arrangements for consultation with the community following the reorganisation of the force have not yet been decided. Discussions will be held with borough and district councils, community/police consultative groups and representatives of the local community to ensure that the arrangements established in each area are well adapted to its needs and have the support of the local community.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, after the revision of the Metropolitan police organisation, it is the intention to appoint community liaison officers within the police for each division, instead of one for the whole borough as at present; and whether he considers that the officer with the rank of superintendent, responsible for deputy assistant commissioner services within each area, will have adequate time to devote to community relations, as well as to his other responsibilities including administration, press and publicity.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that it is his intention to appoint a community liaison officer for each division. Instead of one for each district. No final decision will be made about the rank or range of duties to be performed by the officer responsible for "DAC services" at area headquarters until local discussions have taken place with those involved.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the structure of the branch of the Metropolitan police with functions similar to that of A7 after the revision of the Metropolitan police organisation, described in the police press release on 20 November 1984; what its terms of reference will be; what authority it will have within the divisions on community and race relations issues; and whether it will be the place of reference within the Metropolitan police to which consultative groups and London-wide organisations with an interest in these matters can make representations about the overall policy of the force.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that he has no detailed plans at present to change the structure and role of A7 branch. Existing functions of the branch will remain an integral part of his organisation; any changes which become necessary as a consequence of force reorganisation will be implemented only after full discussion with interested parties.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

O and A-level Examinations

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if the Secondary Examination Council has any duty to report to him variations over time in the standard of O and A-level examinations.

Mr. Dunn: The council is obliged to report to my right hon. Friend on the discharge of all its functions.

Secondary Schools (Discipline)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about methods for enforcing discipline in maintained secondary schools other than corporal punishment; and what steps he takes to disseminate information about effective methods to teachers throughout the country.

Mr. Dunn: A considerable amount of information about this topic reaches my right hon. Friend through HM Inspectorate which, in the course of its work observes, discusses and disseminates information about a range of disciplinary issues. These issues are sometimes raised in school inspection reports, which are now published.

Open University

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the value of the Government grant to the Open University for each year since 1971 in real terms, using 100 as a base in 1971.

Mr. Brooke: The following table gives the recurrent grant for each financial year; the recurrent grant revalued to 1983-84 cost terms*; and also expressed as an index using 100 as a base for the financial year 1971-72.

* Cost terms figures result from adjusting the cash outturn figures for past years to a base of average 1983-84 prices using the deflator for gross domestic product at market prices.

* These sums exclude the loans of £1 million in 1982-83, £0·7 million in 1983-84 and £0·8 million in 1984-85 which were made available to enable the university to develop its professional, industrial and commercial updating activities.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the real cost of Open University tuition fees and summer school fees for each year since 1971, using 100 as a base for 1971.

Mr. Brooke: The following table gives the undergraduate tuition fees and summer school fees revalued to 1983-84 cost terms*; and expressed as an index using 100 as a base for 1971.

* Cost terms figures result from adjusting the cash outturn figures for past years to a base of average 1983-84 prices using the deflator for gross domestic product at market prices.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has received concerning the pupil-teacher ratio in maintained primary and secondary schools in Yorkshire and Humberside, west Yorkshire and Kirklees, respectively, since January 1984.

Mr. Dunn: I have no information for later than January 1984 when the pupil-teacher ratios were as follows:

	Pupil-teacher ratio within maintained primary schools	Pupil-teacher ratio within maintained secondary schools
Yorkshire and Humberside* region	21·4	16·5
West Yorkshire metropolitan authority	21·8	17·0
Kirklees local education authority	22·5	17·1

* This includes Humberside LEA, North Yorkshire LEA, South Yorkshire metropolitan county and West Yorkshire metropolitan county.

Physically Impaired Pupils (Teachers)

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce a decision on the proposals of the Advisory Committee on Supply and Education of Teachers for withdrawing the mandatory requirement for a specialist qualification for teachers of the blind, deaf and partially hearing.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales are still considering the report of the committee on teacher training for special education which contains this proposal.

School Meals

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science by how much public expenditure would be reduced if parents accepted the full cost of school meals.

Mr. Dunn: Local education authorities have budgeted to spend £415 million on school meals in 1984-85. Public expenditure would fall by that amount if parents accepted the full cost of school meals.

Plant Breeding Institute (Aphids Research)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the stopping of research on resistance to aphids at the Plant Breeding Institute; and what response he has given.

Mr. Brooke: I received two letters early last year from an hon. Member about the Agricultural and Food Research Council's decision to stop research on resistance to aphids at the Plant Breeding Institute in Cambridge. In reply, I explained that it is for the AFRC to decide and continually to review, its scientific priorities within the resources available to it; and that against that background I understood that the work on aphid resistance at the PBI had been reviewed by the institute's director and his senior staff and judged to be a relatively low priority, a view which was shared by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which commissioned the work.

Computing Sciences Centre, Milton Keynes

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimate of salaries at the proposed computing sciences centre at Milton Keynes compared with equivalent posts in universities.

Mr. Brooke: The proposed institute of information technology to which the hon. Member refers is to be a private venture sponsored by a number of industrial concerns. The renumeration of its academic staff will be a matter for decision by those responsible for managing the institute.

Hammersmith Hospital (Imaging Techniques)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from Sir James Gowans about saving the project at Hammersmith hospital in London on refining imaging techniques using nuclear magnetic resonance scanners.

Mr. Brooke: None.

European Organisation for Nuclear Research

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to receive the report of Sir John Kendrew's committee on the future of the European Organisation for Nuclear Research; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) on 28 January 1985 at columns 35-36.

Research Councils (Restructuring)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current cost estimate for restructuring the Agricultural and Food Research Council and the Natural Environment Research Council.

Mr. Brooke: The current estimates of the additional costs of restructuring the Agricultural and Food Research Council and the Natural Environment Research Council in the four years 1984-85 to 1987-88 are as follows:

	Agricultural and Food Research Council £ million	Natural Environment Research Council £ million
1984-85	3·3	0·25
1985-86	6·0	3·1
1987-88	3·6	1·75

As my right hon. Friend announced on 10 January, the grants-in-aid for 1985-86 to the Agricultural and Food Research Council and the Natural Environment Research Council will be £50·3 million and £67·3 million respectively. These grants-in-aid include sums of £4·8 million and £1·25 million, respectively, which the Advisory Board for Research Councils intends for use in assisting these councils with their restructuring plans. The possibility of providing further special support for this purpose in 1986-87 and 1987-88 will be reviewed later this year.

Scientific Projects

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what projects of high scientific promise his Department is supporting.

Mr. Brooke: The Department does not directly support any research in the natural sciences. The most recent information about particular research projects and programmes supported by the Research Councils, which receive grants-in-aid from the Department through the science budget, can be found in its 1983-84 annual reports, copies of which are in the Library. The councils' peer review systems aim to ensure that only work of the highest scientific promise receives support.

Handicapped Pupils

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current level of and trends in the provision of education for children between 16 and 19 years who have been assessed as having special educational needs.

Sir Keith Joseph: The number of pupils in the age range 16 to 19 in special schools rose from 5,586 in 1980 to 8,767 in 1984. This reflects a welcome trend in the extension of provision for this group of pupils. Although there are no equivalent figures available for students with special educational needs in full-time further education I am aware that colleges are increasingly providing for such students, particularly for those with moderate learning difficulties.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance has most recently been issued by his Department regarding the duty of local education authorities to provide education for handicapped pupils in the 16 to 19 years age range.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have made clear on a number of occasions my view that local education authorities have a duty to provide full-time education for young people aged 16 to 19 who seek it, including those with special educational needs.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list his powers regarding the education of young people between 16 and 19 years who have been assessed as having special educational needs.

Sir Keith Joseph: My powers are as follows:—

(1) to determine appeals under section 5*(6)* of the Education Act 1981 against a decision by a local education authority not to issue a statement of special educational needs in respect of such a young person who is a registered pupil at a school;

(2) to determine appeals under section 8*(6)* of the Education Act 1981 against the special educational provision to be made under a statement of special educational needs;

(3) to investigate and determine complaints under sections 68 and 99 of the Education Act 1944 that a local education authority has acted, or is proposing to act, unreasonably, or has failed in a statutory duty.

TRANSPORT

Public Service Vehicles

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will amend the Public Service Vehicles (Carrying Capacity) Regulations 1983 so as to require that on public service vehicles no children over five years of age will be permitted to sit three to a seat whose normal capacity is two persons.

Mrs. Chalker: No. A seat designed for two adults can safely be used by three children, and this has always been permitted under PSV (Carrying Capacity) Regulations.

Tyneside Metro

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from private investors seeking a share of the ownership of the Tyneside Metro.

Mrs. Chalker: There have been no such proposals.

Fog Detection

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Transport if it is proposed to introduce the Marconi MET-3 fog detection system on motorway black spots at an early date.

Mrs. Chalker: Marconi fog detection systems will be installed on a number of selected sites on the M25 motorway. Further installation will depend on the results of the trials on the M4 motorway and the benefits of other sensing devices.

Stolport (Newham)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what aircraft would be capable of using the proposed Stolport at the Royal docks, Newham, if the runway length was 1,200 metres which would not be capable of using it if the runway length was 762 metres.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The considerations which determine whether an aircraft can safely operate on a runway of given length are complex and I shall write to the hon. Member.

Helicopters

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the use of helicopters at airports.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Provided that helicopter operators satisfy the Civil Aviation Authority that their proposed operations are safe, that where applicable the authority has granted an air transport licence, and that they do not cause undue noise disturbance to people on the ground, the Government regard the provision of helicopter services as a matter for operators' commercial judgment.

Bolton (Road Safety)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accident investigation and prevention road safety measures have been carried out in the Bolton area during the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: This information is available only from Greater Manchester county council or Bolton county borough council. I much regret that neither council is passing this information to the Department at present, so that I cannot pass it to my hon. Friend. The Department does not keep records of local road safety activities.

Merseyside (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the recent visit to Merseyside of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I visited Merseyside on 25 January to see Liverpool airport and hold discussions with the airport committee chairman and airport director. I also visited Merseyside Passenger Transport Executive and had discussions with the directors of the executive.

M25 Motorway

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what parts of the section of the M25 from the A13 to the M20 are placed in cuttings.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows:

(1) 200 metres of the interchange with the new A13 (Junction 30).

(2) 100 metres of the interchange with the old A13 (Junction 31).

(3) 2·8km of the 4·7km length of M25 between Swanley and Dartford.

The Minch (Nuclear Waste Cargoes)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the frequency of cargoes of nuclear waste through the Minch; what material the ships carry; and what are the ports of departure and arrival of these cargoes.

Mr. Ridley: Movements of plutonium nitrate take place between Dounreay and Sellafield using the ports of Scrabster and Workington. These are in full compliance with national regulations based on the recommendations of the International Maritime Organisation, which do not depend for their effectiveness on the choice of a particular route. Accordingly, my Department does not collect detailed information of the kind requested.

British Airways

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to increase the cash limit on Class VI, Vote 6, as a result of the slippage of the sale of shares in British Airways plc.

Mr. Ridley: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class VI, Vote 6 will be increased by £1,259,000 from £250,000 to £1,509,000, to meet costs arising from preliminary work on the sale. The increase will be charged to the reserve. We had expected to offset these costs against the proceeds of the sale of British Airways this year, but the recent slippage in the privatisation timetable has made this impossible.

Manchester Airport

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those organisations which have recently approached him seeking the expansion of Manchester airport.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 12]: I cannot release the names of such organisations without their specific agreement. But, since July 1983, my department has received 124 letters from individuals and organisations in the North-West region advocating increased use of Manchester airport.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many applications have been made for new scheduled services from Manchester airport by (a) British airlines and (b) foreign airlines; and which of those services would involve new scheduled destinations.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 12]: The Civil Aviation Authority has the following licence applications outstanding for scheduled services from Manchester:

Points or points to be served	Applicant
(i) Domestic routes
Blackpool	Spacegrand
Birmingham/Bournemouth/Cardiff/ Newcastle	Metropolitan Airways
City of London STOLPORT	Brymon Airways
Jersey	Guernsey Airlines
(ii) International routes
Alicante	Orion Airways
Athens	British Airways
	Britannia Airways
	Orion Airways
Amsterdam	Dan-Air Services
Cork	Air Ecosse
	British Airways
Dublin	Dan-Air Services
Dusseldorf	Dan-Air Services
Faro	Britannia Airways
	Orion Airways
Hamburg	Air Ecosse
	Metropolitan Airways
Kano	British Caledonian Airways
Las Palmas	Orion Airways
Lisbon	British Airways
Madrid	British Airways
Malaga	British Airways
	Britannia Airways
	Air Europe
	Orion Airways
Montpelier	Dan-Air Services
Oporto	British Airways
Oslo	Dan-Air Services
	Metropolitan Airways
Stockholm	Dan-Air Services
	Metropolitan Airways
Tenerife	Orion Airways

Amsterdam, Birmingham, Bournemouth, Cardiff, Cork, Dublin, Dusseldorf, Jersey, Madrid and Newcastle are already served from Manchester.

Although one foreign airline has expressed an interest in operating a long haul service, there are no outstanding applications as such to my Department from foreign airlines seeking a permit to operate into Manchester.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all those foreign airlines which operate scheduled services out of Manchester airport; and what is the total number of passengers to have travelled with each such airline using Manchester airport in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 12-13]: The following foreign airlines operate scheduled services out of Manchester:

Quantas	Iberia
Aer Lingus	TAP
Air France	Yugoslav Airlines
Sabena	Cyprus Airways
KLM	Air Malta
Lufthansa	Swiss Air
SAS

The number of passengers carried on the airlines' Manchester services in 1983 was 472,327, but I am unable to give the number of passengers travelling with each of these airlines from Manchester since that information is commercially confidential.

Detailed figures for 1984 are not yet available, but the total number of passengers using Manchester in 1984 was almost 6 million.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report all those destinations from Manchester airport currently served by (a) domestic flights and (b) international flights; and in the case of each destination how many passengers travelled that route in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 13]: The following destinations were served in 1984 by international scheduled services from Manchester airport:

Amsterdam	Dusseldorf
Athens	Faro
Bangkok	Frankfurt
Barcelona	Larnaca
Brussels	Lisbon
Copenhagen	Madrid
Cork	Malaga
Dublin	Melbourne
Dubrovnik	Milan

Nice	Rome
Paphos	Shannon
Paris	Sydney
Pula	Zurich

The following destinations were served in 1984 by domestic scheduled services:

Aberdeen	Dundee
Belfast (Aldergrove)	Edinburgh
Belfast (Harbour)	Gatwick
Birmingham	Glasgow
Bournemouth	Heathrow
Cardiff	Isle of Man
Channel Islands	Newcastle

In addition, approximately 160 foreign destinations, mainly in Europe, were served in 1984 by charter and air taxi flights.

I have not given details of the passengers carried on each route since some of this information is commercially confidential.

Chief Inspecting Officer of Railways (Report)

Mr. Pawsey: asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the annual report of the Chief Inspecting Officer of Railways for 1984 to be published formally; and what is the earliest date on which a copy could be made available to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 15]: I expect the chief inspecting Officer's annual report to be published before the end of September. I cannot give a precise date for its publication, but I shall ensure that a copy of the report is made available to my hon. Friend as soon as it is published.

Train Accident (Rugby)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 24 January, if he will explain the circumstances in which a British Rail engineer's train was propelled past a signal at danger on to the main line; at what estimated closing speed the two trains collided; what damage was caused to the two trains involved, to the track, to signalling equipment and to overhead lines and how long they were each out of service as a result; what was the nature of the minor injuries sustained and if those affected are eligible for compensation; what is the nature of the action taken by British Rail to prevent a reccurrence; whether the driver of the passenger train involved has been commended for his action; what is the nature of the disciplinary action taken against those members of British Rail Staff held responsible for the accident and what were their functions at the time of the accident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 15]: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

EMPLOYMENT

Falkland Islands

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how much expenditure he estimates will be incurred during 1984-85 by his Department on activities related to the Falkland Islands, including recruitment costs at local offices.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Minimal expenditure has been incurred by certain jobcentres in connection with recruitment for vacancies in the Falkland Islands. Precise figures are not available. There is no other known expenditure by this Department on activities related to the Falkland Islands.

Southampton Skillcentre

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received concerning the future of the annexe to the Southampton skillcentre; if he will now reconsider his decision to close down the annexe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The skillcentre training agency's proposals to the Manpower Services Commission for the future development of the skillcentre network were announced by my right hon. Friend on 29 November 1984, at column 1108. Since then, my right hon. Friend and I have received two letters about the proposed closure of the annexe to Southampton skillcentre. I know that the commission chairman has also received a number of letters on the subject and that meetings have been held between his officials and Southampton city council, Hampshire county council and the Hampshire development association.

The commission endorsed the agency's proposals when it met on 24 January.

We are considering the commission's advice.

Community Programme

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are presently employed under the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 14 December, the latest date for which figures are available, 130,027 people were in jobs funded under the community programme.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, pursuant to his reply of 13 December, Official Report, columns 558-59, he will provide, for each of the given percentages of former participants who were in work at the time of the follow-up survey, that proportion who had participated as full-time workers on the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 10 January, at column 537.

Schoolchildren (Careers Guidance)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied with the current level of careers advice given to schoolchildren in the Yorkshire and Humberside region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The provision of careers advice in schools is the responsibility of local education authorities. If the hon. Member knows of any particular problems in the Yorkshire and Humberside region, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and I would be pleased to hear from him.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people currently receiving unemployment benefit have never been in employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on claimants who have been unemployed since leaving full-time education is available in the Library.

Notifiable Installations

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has anything to add to the answer of 17 January to the hon. Member for Gower regarding notifiable installations constituting a major hazard in respect of such installations in the county of South Glamorgan.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: By the end of December 1984 the number of installations notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 in the county of South Glamorgan was 12. I am sorry that this information was missed out of my reply to the hon. Member's earlier question on 17 January 1985, at column 214.

Self-Employed Persons (Green Paper)

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he will publish the Green Paper on the self-employed.

Mr. Alan Clark: I know of no such Green Paper.

Young Persons

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish, for each borough in the London region of the Manpower Services Commission, and for (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds and (c) 18-year-olds the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education college, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is as follows and is subject to the comments I made in reply to similar questions on 21 January 1985, at columns 286-96.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish for each Manpower Services Commission region and area the number of (a) 16-year-olds and (b) 17-year-olds expected to enter the youth training scheme in 1985-86 on the basis of the eligibility rules announced on 12 November 1984.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I regret the information is not yet available in the form requested. I shall write to the hon. Member when I can give him further information.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of Manpower Services Commission mode A trainees in inner Merseyside during 1984 were from ethnic minorities.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 18]: Information on the ethnic origin of youth training scheme participants is collected through managing agents and sponsors and this shows that some 2·3 per cent. of entrants to mode A schemes in the Manpower Services Commission inner Merseyside area in 1984 were from ethnic minorities.

Job-Splitting Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the annual cost of the job-splitting scheme as a crude figure and as a percentage of job creation schemes; if he will give the number of entrants to date according to sex and marital status, subdivided according to age, and further subdivided according to the preceding length of unemployment; and if he will make a statement about the relative success and the possibilities of extending the scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: In 1983-84, expenditure on the job splitting scheme was £323,000, slightly over one tenth of 1 per cent. of total expenditure in that year on the employment and training measure. 1,023 applications have been approved to date, creating 2,046 part-time jobs. Women were engaged initially in three quarters of the jobs created and young people under 25 were engaged in just under a half. Further information on marital status and length of unemployment could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Take-up under this experimental scheme has been disappointing. However, as my right hon. Friend announced on November 12 1984, at column 444, changes are to be made to the scheme designed to improve its attractiveness to employers and thus the help it can give to the unemployed.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make available from the January 1984 survey of those having joined the enterprise allowance scheme, and in respect of only those who were still trading after 18 months, the percentage of those entrants who had been unemployed for more than 12 months prior to joining the scheme by age, sex and marital status.

Mr. Alan Clark: The January 1984 survey of enterprise allowance scheme participants relates to data collected from a representative sample of those receiving the allowance in the pilot areas in the middle of June 1983. The survey does not provide any information on scheme participants who were still trading after 18 months.

Information from the separate follow-up survey of entrants to the pilot schemes six months after they had left is not at present available broken down in the way requested by the hon. Member. I shall write to him in due course when it has been possible to determine how much information on the basis he has requested can, at reasonable cost, be derived from the survey results.

Equal Opportunities Commission (Code of Practice)

Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether, in the light of the recommendation of the Select Committee on Employment that he should approve the Equal Opportunities Commission's draft code of practice, he now intends to do so.

Mr. Tom King: I have today laid the draft code before Parliament for its approval under the negative resolution procedure. I welcomed the Select Committee's report and I consider the draft code to be a sensible and practical document which should be of help to employers in promoting equal opportunities and in avoiding claims of sex discrimination.

Skillcentre Training Agency

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Employment what report he has received of the Manpower Services Commission's discussion on 24 January of the proposals in the commission paper MSC/84/66 for the future development of the skillcentre training agency.

Mr. Tom King: The chairman of the Manpower Services Commission wrote to me on 24 January with a full report of the commission's discussion, which concluded with the commission endorsing the skillcentre training agency's proposals in the paper MSC/84/66. A copy of the chairman's letter has been placed in the Library of the House.

Unemployment Benefit (Seasonal Workers)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons in each of the past five years have appealed against having unemployment benefit refused to them on the basis that they are deemed to be seasonal workers.

Mr. Whitney: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested cannot be obtained quickly because of the effects of the Newcastle computer strike, now ended, which will take some time to resolve. I will, therefore, reply to the hon. Member when the information is available.

SCOTLAND

Homes Insulation Scheme

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table giving, by quarter since their inception, for Scotland (a) the number of dwellings insulated under the local authorities energy conservation programme and a breakdown of the body which completed the work, (b) the cost of the programme and (c) the number of dwellings insulated under the home insulation scheme and a breakdown of tenancies to whom the grants were paid, (d) the amounts of the payments, (e) the number of 90 per cent. grants paid and their costs and (f) the financial allocation for each of the past financial years to each of these schemes and the allocation for the current financial year.

Mr. Ancram: The following tables give the information available on the local authority energy conservation programme and the homes insulation scheme. A breakdown of tenures in respect of grants paid under the homes insulation scheme for Scotland is not available centrally.

Psychiatrists

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the ratio of consultant psychiatrists to the population in each of the Scottish health board areas.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is as follows:

	Ratio per 100,000 population
Scotland	4·6
Argyll and Clyde	4·0
Ayrshire and Arran	1·9
Borders	3·0
Dumfries and Galloway	6·2
Fife	4·4

	Ratio per 100,000 population

Shetland	—
Tayside	6·2
Western Isles	—

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many doctors entered postgraduate training in psychiatry in Scotland in each of the last three years for which figures are available; and how many newly qualified psychiatrists are required each year to maintain existing staffing levels.

Mr. John MacKay: The information available relates to doctors entering higher medical training in the psychiatric specialties in Scotland at the grade of senior registrar. Details are set out in the following table. It is estimated that an average of seven new consultant psychiatrists would be required annually to maintain existing staffing levels.

*Year	First Year Senior Registrars
1982	11
1983	15
1984	16·5

* as at 30 September.

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the recommended ratio of consultant psychiatrists to the population in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: There is no nationally accepted ratio of consultant psychiatrists to population. Requests for additional consultant posts in this specialty can normally be approved in view of the recommendations contained in the report, "Scottish Health Authorities' Priorities for the Eighties".

Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses completed community psychiatric nurse training in Scotland in each of the last three years.

Mr. John MacKay: Details for the most recent years for which complete statistical information is available are as follows:

	Number
1981	10

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses were seconded by Scottish health boards for community psychiatric nurse training outside Scotland in each of the last three years.

Mr. John MacKay: The most recent years for which complete statistical information is available are 1981, 1982 and 1983. During these years Scottish health boards did not second any nurses for community psychiatric training outside Scotland. Information received from the Forth Valley health board relating to 1984 indicates that one nurse was seconded to England for community psychiatric nurse training.

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many qualified community psychiatric nurses were employed by each health board in Scotland in each of the last three years.

Mr. John MacKay: The most recent years for which complete statistical information is available are 1981, 1982 and 1983. The following table gives the numbers of qualified nurses employed as community psychiatric nurses in each health board for each year.

Hexafluorosilicic Acid and Disodium Hexafluorosilicate

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether hexafluorosilicic acid and disodium hexafluorosilicate have ever been submitted to the Committee for the Safety of Medicines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: These substances have never been considered appropriate for submitting to the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Hallside Village (Property Survey)

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what financial support his Department proposes to give to Glasgow district council for a property survey being carried out in Hallside village, Cambuslang, in connection with the bringing of the houses and environs up to a tolerable level of habitation.

Mr. George Younger: None; local authorities have a duty to undertake, or arrange, such surveys from time to time under section 13(3) of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1974.

Scottish Development Agency

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report past, present and future Scottish Development Agency-funded environmental improvement projects in each of the Scottish constituencies.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 26 November 1984, c. 372]: Information on SDA-funded environmental projects in each Scottish constituency is contained in the following table:

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any information as to the additional costs, including transport costs, incurred (a) by the National Coal Board and (b) by the Central Electricity Generating Board, to date arising from the strike in the mining industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The eventual cost of the dispute cannot be estimated until it is over.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much extra oil has been used for electricity generation in the first 10 months of the current industrial dispute as compared with the same period one year earlier; and what has been the extra cost.

Mr. Goodlad: Figures for fuel used in the generation of electricity appear in Energy Trends, which is published monthly. The final cost of the coal dispute cannot be determined until it is over.

Plutonium Isotopes (Transport)

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report a typical inventory of the different plutonium isotopes carried in a package of plutonium nitrate between Dounreay and Sellafield.

Mr. Goodlad: The isotopic composition of the plutonium nitrate liquor in any package will vary with its radiation history. The following breakdown is roughly typical:

	per cent.
Plutonium 239	70
Plutonium 240	25
Plutonium 241	4
Other isotopes	1

Pit Closures

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied with the accounting practices of the National Coal Board in respect of pit closures.

Mr. David Hunt: Yes.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department monitors the accounts of the National Coal Board in relation to the cost of redundancy payments incurred as a consequence of pit closures.

Mr. David Hunt: Yes.

Atomic Energy Authority

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the value of work undertaken by the Atomic Energy Authority (a) for the nuclear industry and (b) for non-nuclear customers under the Science and Technology Act 1965 for each year since 1980.

Mr. Goodlad: The following table, derived from the authority's report and accounts for the years in question, shows the income received for nuclear and non-nuclear work. It excludes income arising as a by-product of or as a contribution to the authority's Vote-funded programmes; for example, sales of electricity.

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Nuclear work	46·8	52·7	52·9	57·4
Non-nuclear work	21·7	25·2	25·1	27·3

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current status of the research facilities of the Atomic Energy Authority at Winfrith Heath, Dorset, in relation to the steam generating heavy water reactor; what are the uses to which these facilities are now put; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The Winfrith SGHW reactor continues to operate very reliably as an electricity generating station and as a valuable test facility, with a load factor of over 73 per cent. in 1983-84. Continued operation of the reactor enables the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority to gain valuable information and experience on water cooled reactors.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he takes to satisfy himself that the current statutory financial framework at the Atomic Energy Authority is consistent with its overall objectives and its duty to earn an appropriate rate of return on funds invested.

Mr. Goodlad: The authority's statutory financial framework is contained in the provisions of the Atomic Energy Authority Act 1954, as amended: it does not include a duty to earn a rate of return on funds invested. However, the letter from my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) of 13 May 1983 to the then chairman of the authority setting out objectives included a requirement to make a profit on repayment work, both nuclear and non-nuclear, in accordance with terms discussed with the Department. A copy of the letter was published in the Official Report on 28 June 1983, at columns 45-46.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Gulf (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Nelson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the visit of the Minister of State the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) to the Gulf earlier in the current month with particular reference to the progress made in bilateral commission talks with the sultanate of Oman and the issues discussed.

Mr. Luce: I visited Bahrain and Oman from 9 to 17 January. In Bahrain I held discussions on bilateral and regional matters with His Highness the Amir, and with leading Bahraini Ministers. I also attended an informal conference of British ambassadors serving in the Gulf region.

In Oman I called on His Majesty Sultan Qaboos and met a number of other senior Omani personalities. I also led the British delegation to the third meeting of the United Kingdom-Oman joint commission. My discussions provided the opportunity for useful exchanges of view on international defence questions, the regional situation, Arab-Israel, Lebanon, and East-West relations. I was also able to discuss in some detail our co-operation in several areas of practical importance, including education, health and civil administration.

Our bilateral relations with Oman, which are of long standing, are excellent. We will work to maintain and improve the relationship, and welcome the recent formation of an Anglo-Omani parliamentary group as a contribution to even closer understanding and friendship between our two countries.

Cyprus

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent United Nations talks between the leaders of the communities in Cyprus.

Mr. Renton: We are disappointed that the outcome to the high-level meeting between the leaders of the two communities in Cyprus was not more positive. We have consistently supported the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to seek a settlement of the Cyprus problem and we welcome his statement that the gap between the two sides hasnever been so narrow and for the need to persevere. We have impressed upon the parties concerned the need to seize the opportunity the Secretary-General has created.

We hope it will be possible to arrange a further joint high-level meeting as the Secretary-General envisages and remain ready to support his initiative in whatever way we can.

European Assembly

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what views have been expressed by Her Majesty's Government in the European Council of Ministers about the additional cost to United Kingdom taxpayers of the continuous rotation of the European Assembly between different venues; and what steps he intends to take to insist upon an early resolution of this matter.

Mr. Rifkind: This question has been periodically examined by the Council of Ministers, but it remains unresolved. We have drawn the attention of our partners to the additional cost and the reduced efficiency entailed by the lack of a single seat for the European Parliament. Under the treaties, a decision on the seat of the institutions will be taken by common accord of the Governments of member states, though we would think it right for the European Parliament itself to be consulted before a decision was taken.

European Community Budget

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out and explain the formula referred to by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) on 23 January, Official Report, column 978, by which agriculture will progressively represent an increasingly small share of European Economic Community budget.

Mr. Rifkind: The conclusions of the Council on the measures necessary to guarantee the effective implementation of budgetary discipline, which were adopted on 4 December 1984, provide that the net expenditure relating to agricultural markets will increase by less than the rate of growth of the own resources base which depends mainly on inflation, growth in consumption and the evolution of agricultural levies and customs duties. This means that agricultural expenditure will decline progressively as a proportion of the Community budget.

ENVIRONMENT

Falkland Islands
(Vic Hallam Construction Company)

51. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the work done for his Department by the Vic Hallam Construction Company in the Falkland Islands.

Sir. George Young: I have nothing to add to my answer of 11 December 1984, at column 440.

Control of Pollution Act 1974

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what he estimates will be the cost to the water authorities of implementing the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

Mr. Macfarlane: It is for water authorities to estimate and meet their own costs in connection with the implementation of part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. My Department has no figures. However, it was estimated in 1981 that some 100 extra staff could be needed to administer the Act when it is fully implemented. Since that estimate was made the numbers employed by the water authorities have reduced by more than 9,000.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made on the implementation of part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: A commencement order and associated regulations will come into force on 31 January, to make part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 the statutory basis for water pollution control in Great Britain. The Act will then provide a comprehensive framework for protecting the water environment. All waters around our coasts, and all inland waters will come within the pollution control system, as well as such underground waters as may be specified.

Although certain provisions of that part of the Act remain to be brought into force, we will have completed phase 2 of the implementation programme announced by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw) on 15 February 1982.

Specific provisions now coming into effect include those which give water authorities in England and Wales, and in Scotland the river purification boards, wide powers to deal with accidental pollution and to prevent pollution from agricultural sources. Codes of good agricultural practice published by my right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales, on 22 January provide farmers with guidance on the measures to be taken to avoid polluting the water environment. Other regulations soon to be laid before the House will require authorities from 31 July to keep public registers giving details of the conditions attached to consents for discharges to relevant waters and of samples of these discharges.

I have also agreed with the Water Authorities Association a memorandum of practice on the consenting and monitoring of water authorities' own discharges, and I am placing copies in the Libraries of the House.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list in the Official Report the number of non-standard dwellings in need of renovation in each housing authority in England and indicate the percentage this represents of total housing stock in each case;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the number of dwellings fit but lacking basic amenities in each housing authority area in England and indicate the percentage this represents of total housing stock in each case;

(3) if he will list in the Official Report the number of unfit dwellings in each housing authority area in England and indicate the percentage this represents of total housing stock in each case.

Sir George Young: Local authorities' 1984 housing investment programme returns included, for 1 April, their estimates of defective dwellings in their areas. Numbers reported are not necessarily comparable, as authorities' criteria may differ and in total they are not consistent with estimates from English House Condition Survey of 1981. The figures reported are as follows:

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the number of sheltered dwellings in each housing authority area in England and indicate the percentage this represents of total housing stock in each case.

Sir George Young: Local authorities' estimates of the numbers of sheltered dwellings in their areas at 1 April 1984, as reported in their housing investment programme returns, are as follows:

Sheltered Dwellings, by Local Authority, England 1 April 1984

Pesticides

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which pesticides either his Department or the water authorities have plans to monitor apart from organochlorine insecticides.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction has recently approved proposals for exploratory surveys of rivers for a range of pesticides; in particular, organo-tin compounds, organophosphorous compounds, the triazines and the permethrins.

We have advised water undertakers that they should analyse water supplies for pesticides such as organophosphorous insecticides, phenoxyacetic acid and triazine herbicides, where these substances are likely to occur in their waters.

Water Authorities

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will produce a table showing the return of assets for each of the water authorities in England in the years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84; and what are the estimated figures for 1984-85.

Mr. Macfarlane: The form of accounts used prior to 1981-82 does not enable a rate of return comparable with later years to be calculated; and it is too early to estimate the outturn for 1984-85. The other figures requested are shown in the following table:

*Financial Target and Achievement

(both expressed as a percentage of net assets, at current cost)

Name of Water Authority	1981-82 Target	1981-82 Achievement	1982-83 Target	1982-83 Achievement	1983-84 Target	1983-84 Achievement	1984-85 Target†

Yorkshire	0·85	1·10	1·14	1·52	1·25	1·65	1·00

* The achievement figure includes both current cost operating profit for the year and any balance brought forward, as defined in the relevant Return of Assets Order.

† A reassessment of asset values, described in note 1 to the current cost supplementary statements in the authorities' account for 1983-84, resulted in generally higher asset values. These higher values were taken into account in setting financial targets for 1984-85. The targets set for 1984-85 average about 1 per cent.; on an equivalent basis the targets for 1983-84 would have averaged 0·94 per cent.

Commercial and Industrial Buildings (Use)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to amend the general development orders 1977 to 1981 in the light of continuing technological advancement in respect of the use of commercial and industrial buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I am not currently persuaded that amendments to the Town and Country Planning General Development Order, or indeed to the Use Classes Order would be of help in this field. I have examined the idea of creating a special class for high-technology uses in the Use Classes Order. In doing so, I have concluded that much of the alleged difficulty in this area comes from unfamiliarity with this new type of development, and that the introduction of a new class would create considerable problems of definition and rigidity. My Department has issued advice on planning and high-technology in circular 16/84 and has also liaised with the National Development Control Forum on the issue of a guidance booklet on the subject. We have also consulted a wige range of interests on a proposed amendment to the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, which would give greater flexibility for changes between alternative permitted uses. Such a change should benefit users who, in planning terms, incorporate disparate elements such as office, storage and research and development.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to seek to amend the Town and Country Planning Acts to give greater flexibility of use to owners of commercial and industrial buildings engaged in the field of high technology industries.

Mr. Macfarlane: As soon as the parliamentary timetable permits, I would hope to introduce a provision on the lines of that set out in my Department's consultation letter of 30 July 1984.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the length of time taken by the Property Services Agency to settle contractors' accounts in respect of measured term contracts for contracts (a) to £500,000, (b) from £500,000 to £1 million, (c) from £1 million to £2 million and (d) over £2 million, respectively.

Sir. George Young: Each order under a measured term contract is the subject of a separate final account. On average, it takes four months from the date of completion of the work to settlement of the final account. During this period the work has to be jointly measured, priced and agreed between the contractor and the agency's quantity surveyor, and the account prepared, checked and submitted for payment. The average time taken to clear final accounts applies to all MTCs irrespective of the total value of the contract. For orders of more than £1,000 in value, the contractor will have been paid most of the money due during the progress of the work.

London Docklands, Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the change in the number of people employed in undertakings that use the river or dock facilities within the London Docklands Development Corporation area since July 1981;

(2) how many jobs created in the London Docklands Development Corporation area since July 1981 are held by residents of the London boroughs of Newham, Tower Hamlets and Southwark;

(3) how many new jobs created in the London Docklands Development Corporation area since July 1981 have been taken by people who were previously registered unemployed in Southwark, Newham or Tower Hamlets;

(4) what information he has as to how many of the new jobs created in the London Docklands Development Corporation area since July 1981 referred to in his answer to the hon. Member for Newham, South on 28 November, Official Report, column 515, are transfers from other locations.

Sir George Young: This information is not collected.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of people in each of the nine major standard industrial classification categories (1980) among the new jobs created within the London Docklands Development Corporation area since July 1981.

Sir George Young: This information is not broken down by standard industrial classification categories for the LDDC area. The 3,619 new jobs created in the LDDC area since July 1981 (excluding Inner Urban Areas Act related employment) can, however, be broken down into the following categories:

	Number
Office	1,090
Industry	96
Distribution	1,393
Mixed	1,040

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a breakdown by (i) the nine main Standard Industrial Classification Orders (1980) and (ii) the major employer of the 1,629 jobs in the rest of Tower Hamlets, referred to in his answer to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 28 November, Official Report, column 515; and how many of these relate to jobs in St. Katherine's dock.

Sir George Young: This information is not broken down by standard industrial classification categories. The 1,629 jobs in Tower Hamlets within the LDDC area, but excluding those in the enterprise zone, can, however, be broken down as follows:

	Number
Office	710
Distribution	850
Inner Urban Areas Act funded	*69
	1,629

* This category cannot be broken down further.

The major employer within the above total is the ASDA superstore, which has created 350 jobs. Seven hundred and ten of the new jobs are attributable to development at St. Katherine's dock.

Isle of Dogs Enterprise Zone

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the cost of creating each new job in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, excluding jobs in construction, in the London Docklands Development Corporation's own offices and in Cannon workshops in terms of rates forgone plus the cost of infrastructure works.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) on 20 December 1984, at column 267.

Local Authority Charges

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, with reference to the Under-Secretary of State's letter of 11 December 1984 to the local authority associations (a) how this relates to the review of local authority charges undertaken by his predecessor in 1979-80, (b) what was the outcome of this review and what proposals the Government made and (c) under which legislation such proposals have been given effect.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Domestic Rates

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the 1984-85 domestic rate poundage in (a) Kensington and Chelsea and (b) Bournemouth.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is as follows:

	Domestic rate poundage 1984-85
Kensington and Chelsea	137·5p
Bournemouth	149·5p

Greater London Development Plan

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the 33 London borough councils have expressed concern to him about the resources they would have to devote to determining objections to the Greater London council's proposed alterations to the Greater London development plan.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend has received 134 objections and representations to the proposed amendments to the GLDP. Of these, 31 were the initial responses of London boroughs and of the City of London. Boroughs generally were expecting to have to give further consideration to their responses, and in view of anxiety expressed informally to my Department, I am satisfied that further consideration would have caused a drain on authorities' resources during a period of preparation for taking on new responsibilities from April 1986, with little certainty of the process of adopting the amendments being completed before abolition of the GLC.

Local Authorities (Expenditure Limits)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to each authority that decided not to apply for redetermination of its expenditure limit about its reasons for deciding not to seek a redetermination.

Mr. Waldegrave: A number of designated authorities alleged that by applying for a redetermination they laid themselves open either to a reduced expenditure level, or to the imposition of onerous requirements in respect of their detailed spending decisions. We made it clear on a number of occasions that neither course was likely. I can only assume from the absence of applications that the authorities are content with the expenditure levels set.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which factors he took into account in deciding which of the concerns expressed in reply to the consultation paper, "Streamlining the Cities: Housing", to meet when announcing changes to his original proposals to abolish the Greater London council housing role.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend took into account all the representations which had been made to us.

Civil Airports (Noise Control)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the civil airports in England for which local authorities do not have some responsibility for the control of aircraft noise.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have been asked to reply. I am writing to the hon. Member.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Wild Animals

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to amend the law on the keeping of wild animals in Northern Ireland in order to make it consistent with the law in Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No.

Departmental Publications

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what sums have been expended by his Department in each of the last two years on documents and publications issued free of charge to (a) doctors, (b) pharmacists and (c) other persons or bodies; and what were the sums expended in (i) 1970, (ii) 1975 and (iii) 1980 in cash and in constant prices taking 1970 as the base.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not held in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Housing Executive

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applicants there were at the latest available date in Northern Ireland for Housing Executive accommodation in each council area; how many empty Housing Executive dwellings and units of accommodation there were in each area on the same date; how many of such dwellings or units of accommodation in each such area had been vacant for more than three months; and how many of the applicants have applied for accommodation in more than one council area.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Equal Opportunities (Questionnaire)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether it is compulsory for civil servants in Northern Ireland to fill in the recently circulated equal opportunities questionnaire; and if the questionnaire has been sent to civil servants from Great Britain who work in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: Completion of the questionnaire is voluntary; if has been issued only to non-industrial members of the Northern Ireland Civil Service.

Civil Service

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland of the total numbers of Civil Service personnel presently serving in Northern Ireland, how many are members of the Northern Ireland Civil Service; and how many are members of the United Kingdom Civil Service;

Dr. Boyson: Of those civil servants in Northern Ireland for whom my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is responsible, 31,251 (including 5,919 in industrial grades) are members of the Northern Ireland Civil Service and 62 are members of the Home Civil Service. A number of Home Civil Servants serve in other Departments in Northern Ireland.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he takes any steps to determine the political affiliations of civil servants in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: No.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list in the Official Report those items of Civil Service conditions or requirements which, if applied equally, would constitute discrimination.

Dr. Boyson: I am not aware of any such matters, but if the hon. Gentleman has any particular point in mind I shall be glad to consider it.

Nurses

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many nurses at the latest available date are in training in Northern Ireland; of these how many are in (a) each year of the training course and (b) each year of the training course in each training hospital; in each case how many are training for each recognised nursing qualification; and how many in each case are from (i) Northern Ireland, (ii) the Irish Republic and (iii) elsewhere.

Mr. Chris Patten: At 23 January 1985 there were 708 nurses in training in Northern Ireland. The breakdown of that number by training courses, years and nurse qualifications is as follows:

Place	Course	Length	Numbers by years	With addresses in
				Northern Ireland	Republic of Ireland	Elsewhere
University of Ulster (Coleraine Compound)	BA Honours for registered nurses	4 years (Initial course commenced 1982)	1st year 18 2nd year 12 3rd year 10	20	2	18

In addition:

There are 552 nurses in a range of post-registration and post-enrolled courses at the eight colleges of nursing and midwifery in Northern Ireland, Of these, 62 have addresses in the Republic of Ireland and eight have addresses elsewhere.

Western Health and Social Services Board

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in 1985, how many temporary staff are employed by the Western health and social services board; where those staff were located; what were the numbers at each location; and what were their religious affiliations.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

	Number
Area Board Headquarters	18
Londonderry, Limvady and Strabane Unit of Management	155
Omagh Unit of Management	117
Fermanagh Unit of Management	75
Total Temporary Staff	365

Government Offices

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Government offices in Northern Ireland have been resited or are scheduled for siting or resiting for reasons to do with his equal opportunity policy; and which ones they are.

Dr. Boyson: None. The Government have, however, accepted the recommendation of the Fair Employment Agency that in siting offices it should consider the effect which location might have on equal opportunity and they will take this factor into account, bearing in mind also that offices must be located where they can most efficiently provide public services.

Roads (Maintenance and Improvement)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what sums have been paid in value added tax in respect of (a) road maintenace works in Northern Ireland and (b) road improvement works in Northern Ireland in each of the financial years 1982-83 and 1983-84; and what is his estimate of the sums payable in the current year.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows:

	1982-83 £ million	1983-84 £ million	1984-85 (estimated) £ million
Road maintenace works	3·1	3·9	4·2
Road construction and improvement works	0·2	0·2	1·0

Castledawson Bypass

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he now expects work to begin on the Castledawson bypass.

Mr. Chris Patten: No starting date has yet been fixed.

Primary Schools

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the Protestant-controlled primary schools in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: The controlled primary schools in Northern Ireland are as follows. They are not Protestant schools as such, since they are open to pupils of all denominations, and are required to provide non-denominational religious instruction.

Equal Opportunities Unit

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report a table indicating the number, grades, names, religious affiliation, political affiliation, sex, race and nationality of the staff of the Equal Opportunities Unit as soon as the information is available.

Dr. Boyson: The unit has 12 staff (seven men and five women). It is not the practice to provide personal information about individual civil servants.

Strip Searches

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if any staff members have been reprimanded as a result of conduct during a strip search in prisons in Northern Ireland in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: There is no record of any such reprimand.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches of women prisoners have taken place in the presence of one or more male prison officers in each of the past six years.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985 c. 69]: None: male officers are never present during such searches.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what type of items which may constitute a danger to the prison system are intended to be discovered by strip searching.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: This form of searching, in Northern Ireland as elsewhere, is one of the precautions necessary to minimise the risk of illicit items being brought into or taken out of the prison: in particular firearms, explosives and drugs.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing those items which have been found during a strip searching in each of the past five years.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: One of the most important aspects of any form of searching is its deterrent value. Whilst detailed records are not kept of all the items found during strip searches carried out at individual prison establishments, detonators, drugs, unauthorised cash and illicit letters have been among the items discovered.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement on the contribution of strip searches to prison security in Northern Ireland;

(2) what study of strip searching he has made since his appointment; and what consideration he is giving to such investigations;

(3) if he will order an end to strip searches in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 21 December 1984, at column 382.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many strip searches have taken place in each of the Northern Ireland prisons in each of the past 10 years;

(2) how many prisoners have been subjected to strip searching in each of Northern Ireland's prisons in the past 10 years.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: Records are available only in respect of women prisoners in Armagh prison since November 1982. These are as follows:

Year	Total number of searches	Number of women prisoners involved
1982 November—December	400	(figures not available)
1984	355	228

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what medical or nursing staff are required to be present during a strip search of a prisoner.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: Medical or nursing staff are not normally required to be present during a strip search of a prisoner, but prison rules provide that the governor shall, without prejudice to his other duties, draw the attention of the medical officer without delay to any prisoner whose physical or mental condition appears to require attention.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland at what level of authority individual strip searches are ordered or authorised.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: Prison governors are responsible for such searches carried out in their establishments within the policy laid down by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. In those situations where it is the policy for strip searching to be carried out on a random basis, governors may, in accordance with prison rules, delegate responsibility for selecting individual inmates to other members of the governing grades or to appropriate uniformed officers.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what guidelines are issued to prison staff regarding strip searches; and what sanction there is against a member of staff who breaches those guidelines.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: Detailed instructions are given to staff who carry out this form of search explaining how the searches are to be carried out.

Like all complaints, any complaint against a member of staff arising from a search is carefully investigated and if appropriate, action is taken under the code of discipline.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if there has been any evidence, from medical reports on prisoners, of mental, nervous or physical injuries caused by strip searching in Northern Ireland prisons.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: I am not aware of any such evidence.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what efforts his Department is making regarding the welfare of women prisoners in Northern Ireland; and what further initiatives he proposes in this regard.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 69]: Every effort is made, consistent with the necessary security precautions, to provide for the welfare of women prisoners. These efforts include the work of prison welfare staff and others concerned with rehabilitation, the provision of a wide range of day and evening activities and considerate home leave arrangements. The regime for women prisoners will be reviewed when the new women's prison at Maghaberry is occupied, which is expected to be in about a year's time.

Security

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will ensure that necessary extra resources, including teachers, are made available in controlled primary and secondary schools serving communities close to the frontier with the Irish Republic which have been disadvantaged by the Irish Republican Army's murder campaign against Protestants.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 70]: In the allocation of teaching posts my Department will continue to give sympathetic consideration to cases made on behalf of border schools. As I said in response to the report of the Northern Ireland Assembly on the rationalisation of schools, this will apply to both controlled and voluntary schools.

A-level Curriculum

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the criteria used by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland when deciding whether or not to approve arrangements for the provision of an A-level curriculum in schools in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 71]: Criteria for A-level provision are contained in the arrangements for approval of extended course provision in secondary schools. Details are contained in the Department of Education circular 1983/17 dated 29 April 1983, which has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of A-level students in (a) Enniskillen collegiate school, (b) Fivemiletown high school and (c) Portora royal school during (i) 1983-84, (ii) 1984-85 and (iii) the projected figures for 1985-86.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 71]: The number of pupils following GCE A-level courses in these schools is as follows:

	1983-84	1984-85
A. Enniskillen Collegiate	114	113
B. Fivemiletown High School	18	23
C. Portora Royal School	85	86

Projected figures for 1985-86 are not available centrally.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the subjects offered at A-level and the number of students taking each subject in (a) Enniskillen collegiate school, (b) Fivemiletown high school and (c) Portora royal school during (i) 1983-84, (ii) 1984-85 and (iii) the projected figures for 1985-86.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 71]: Information on subjects offered at A-level is not held centrally, but the numbers of pupils entered for NI GCE A-level subjects in Enniskillen collegiate and Fivemiletown high school in 1983 and 1984 is as follows:

	Fivemiletown High School 1983-84	Enniskillen Collegiate 1983-84
Art	—	4
Biology	3	37
Chemistry	4	14
English Literature	1	25

Similar information is not available centrally for Portora royal school, as most of its A-level students are entered for examinations conducted by Great Britain examination boards. Projected figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are not available centrally.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland under what circumstances the Department of Education for Northern Ireland has approved the provision of an A-level curriculum in Northern Ireland schools where there are only two, three or four students per subject; and if he will now agree to extend such approval to any secondary schools which make such a request and will provide adequate extra staff for this purpose.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 71]: It is possible within the criteria that the overall extended course approval for a school could include classes with a relatively small number of pupils. In addition, in the first year of operation of the new extended courses policy the Department was prepared to give provisional approval in some marginal cases. A number of these approvals will be reviewed for the 1985-86 school year. Requests from each individual school to provide extended courses will be considered on their merits having regard to the criteria.

DEFENCE

Trident

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimated cost of the Trident programme at current prices.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is currently reviewing the estimate of the cost of Trident and expects to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report, on the basis of the current programme for Trident, the amount of work by type and value which might be available for the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry; and what is, for each calendar year over the next decade, the amount of money involved.

Mr. Butler: The United Kingdom Trident force will consist of four submarines which will be built in the United Kingdom. The cost of the submarines represents approximately one-third of the estimated total cost of Trident. It is not our practice to publish year-by-year cost profiles for projects.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to complete the placing of the main contracts for the Trident D5 weapon system.

Mr. Butler: We are purchasing the Trident D5 strategic weapon system from the United States of America under the terms of the Polaris sales agreement. Specific orders are placed by the United States authorities on our behalf. In line with normal financial and contractual procedures, we are giving them progressive authority to enter into commitments. Contracts are being placed to ensure timely delivery to meet submarine fitting dates.

34. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in light of recent currency fluctuations, he will re-estimate the cost of the Trident programme.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer to the answer given earlier today to the hon. Members for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft).

35. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the Trident budget as a whole will be spent in the United States of America; and what proportion of the submarines will be built in the United States of America.

39. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the Trident budget as a whole will be spent in the United States of America; and what proportion of the submarines will be built in the United States of America.

Mr. Butler: I refer to the answer given earlier by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to the hon. Members for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) and for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd). About 45 per cent. of the estimated total cost is expected to be spent in the United States. The four Trident class submarines will be built in the United Kingdom. A relatively small proportion of their estimated cost represents dollar expenditure.

36. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the development of anti-ballistic missile defence systems in space has implications for the Trident missile.

Mr. Heseltine: We are satisfied that the Trident II (D5) missile system will provide us with the most cost-effective means of ensuring the credibility of our national strategic nuclear deterrent, well beyond the turn of the century.

37. Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has considered the recent fluctuations in the value of the £ sterling in assessing the cost of Trident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer to the answer given earlier today to the hon. Members for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft). $1·38 is the rate being used by my Department for this year's recosting of the defence programme, reflecting the long held convention of using the exchange rate current at the end of June preceding the financial year in question. Expenditure on Trident is currently at a comparatively low level. What matters chiefly is the exchange rate when Trident expenditure begins to peak at the end of the decade.

42. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current level of expenditure on the Trident programme.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer to the answer given earlier today to the hon. Members for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft). About £300 million has been spent on the Trident programme to date.

50. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether expenditure on Trident will have any effect on the currently planned in-service dates for (a) EH 101, (b) MCV 80, (c) AST 404, (d) Type 23 frigate, and (e) AST 412.

Mr. Butler: The in-service dates currently assumed for planning purposes for the equipments listed will not be affected by planned expenditure on Trident.

Boarding School Allowance

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Defence what study his Department is currently making of the impact of the practice of grossing-up boarding school allowance for tax purposes where service men serving in the United Kingdom are concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The Ministry of Defence is participating in an interdepartmental study of the effect for service men and other Government employees in certain circumstances of the grossing-up of boarding school allowance for tax purposes. It is too early to say what the outcome will be.

Mean Temperatures

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list in the Official Report the mean temperature for each mainland meteorological station in the United Kingdom for each day from 1 November 1984 until the present.

Mr. Lee: To provide the data required would involve some 40,000 values and disproportionate effort. Those for the 23 key stations representative of the areas in which they are sited are too voluminous to publish in the Official Report. I am therefore sending them to the hon. Member and placing a copy in the Library.

RAF Uxbridge

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the purpose of the 230 ft tower which it is proposed to erect at Royal Air Force Uxbridge; if he will take account of the views expressed by the Hillingdon council and local residents on ways of minimising the effect on the skyline; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The 230 ft tower is part of a new communications scheme for the United States Air Force. It may also carry Royal Air Force communications equipment. The local planning authority has of course been consulted in the usual way. They have made some observations which are now under consideration.

Canberra PR9

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Canberra PR9s were in service in the Royal Air Force in March 1982 and March 1983; and if he will make a statement on the difference in the numbers.

Mr. Stanley: It is not the practice to reveal details relating to numbers of operational aircraft.

Chile (Aircraft Acquisitions)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any aircraft in operation in the Royal Air Force or Royal Navy in March 1982 have been subsequently transferred or sold to Chile; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: Yes. Royal Air Force Hunter and Canberra aircraft in service in March 1982 were subsequently sold to Chile. It has been the consistent policy of this and previous Administrations not to reveal details of defence sales business with other countries.

Shipbuilding Orders

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report the number of vessels by type and by value for which he expects to place orders in the years 1985, 1986 and 1987, respectively.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement on frigates made yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. No firm decisions have been taken on the number or timing of other orders in these years. Such orders will be announced as and when appropriate, and contract values would, of course, depend on negotiation.

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report the number of vessels by type and by value under construction for his Department in United Kingdom shipyards; and if he will give the information by shipyard and state the expected delivery dates on each vessel.

Mr. Lee: Thirty-two ships are currently on order for the Royal Navy with a total value of nearly £3,000 million at today's prices.

The following are the vessels under construction or on order at each shipyard:

Brooke Marine Limited
Coastal Survey Vessel
—HMS Roebuck

Cammell Laird Shipbuilders Limited
Sheffield Class Destroyer (Type 42)
—HMS Edinburgh*

Hall Russell & Co. Limited
Hong Kong Patrol Craft
—HMS Swift*

Broadsword Class Frigate (Type 22)
—HMS Brave*
—HMS London
—HMS Cornwall
—HMS Cumberland

* Denotes expected to be accepted from the shipbuilder during 1985. It is not the practice to give planned acceptance dates. Information on costs of individual contracts is not provided as this is commercially confidential.

Soviet Union

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information is available to him about the scope and nature of research currently being conducted by the Soviet Union into the development of technologies comparable to the United States strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Stanley: For non-classified information I refer the hon. Member to the 1984 edition of "Soviet Military Power" published by the United States Department of Defence, a copy of which I am placing in the Libray. My Department would broadly endorse what is said in that publication about Soviet research and development that is, or could be, relevent to ballistic missile defence.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state Her Majesty's Government's position on proposals for limiting nuclear tests to 150 kilo tonnes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The United Kingdom Government fully support the Threshold Test Ban Treaty of 1974 between the United States and the USSR, which limits nuclear tests to 150 kilo tonnes, and United Kingdom nuclear tests are conducted within this limit.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Defence if blood tests were taken from service personnel before and after nuclear tests in Australia and Christmas Island; and whether records are available.

Mr. Butler: Every United Kingdom service man involved in the test programmes was given a medical examination beforehand. The purpose of this was to determine his fitness to participate. In appropriate cases, this included a blood test. A record of any medical condition so revealed would have been included in the service man's medical record.

Departmental Staff

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the responsibilities of each of the deputy secretaries in his Department and the number and ranks of staff reporting to each.

Mr. Butler: The information requested is as follows:

1. Responsibilities

Deputy Under Secretary (Policy) and his staff, both military and civilian, keep under review defence strategy and policy in their planning and presentational aspects, and carry out long-range studies. The grouping brings together nuclear planning, policy and operational issues.

Deputy Under Secretary (Resources and Programmes) is responsible for co-ordinating the annual long-term costing, including the issue of assumptions in accordance with priorities developed jointly with the defence staff, and for the Ministry's contribution to the Government's public expenditure survey. Major proposals for expenditure, including new equipment programmes, are scrutinised on behalf of the permanent under secretary of state by the finance staff accountable to Deputy Under Secretary (Resources and Programmes).

Deputy Under Secretary (Finance), as the principal finance officer, is responsible for the Ministry's financial management, including cost control and accounts and matters of parliamentary accountability and propriety. All senior finance officers in the Ministry have a responsibility to the PFO.

Deputy Under Secretary (Personnel and Logistics) exercises central responsibility for financial scrutiny of expenditure proposals in the service personnel and logistics areas; and deals with defence lands and works, legal, claims and health and safety policy. He is responsible for the supervision and direction of secretariat aspects of single Service personnel and logistics work.

Deputy Under Secretary (Defence Procurement) is responsible for the formulation and co-ordination of Ministry of Defence procurement policy (including industrial, sales and international aspects), MOD procurement processes and procedures, for relations with industry and other Government Departments on defence equipment issues, and general issues affecting the Procurement Executive as a whole, including the allocation of PE manpower and privatisation. He is also responsible for co-ordination of the PE element of long term costing and defence Estimates, general oversight of the work of the Director General Defence Contracts and the Director General of Quality Assurance.

Deputy Under Secretary (Civilian Management) is the Ministry's principal establishment officer responsible for civilian personnel management, training and conditions, industrial relations and other support functions, including headquarters security and office services.

Deputy Chief Scientific Adviser is responsible for day-to-day management of the central scientific staff and the Defence Operational Analysis Establishment (excluding the nuclear area) and for the professional scientific oversight of all headquarters scientists. He has particular responsibility for operational analysis policy, the formulation of priorities for defence research and technology, including liaison with outside bodies, and advising the chief scientific adviser on the technical and operational feasibility of equipment proposals.

Director General Meteorological Office controls the Meteorological Office. He is responsible for the United Kingdom state meteorological service, including the provision of services to defence, civil aviation, industry and commerce, and the general public, and research in all aspects of meteorology, as well as for United Kingdom participation in the international arrangements for meteorological services and research.

Director Royal Aircraft Establishment is responsible for the management of the Royal Aircraft Establishment and all its activities; and for providing advice on aerospace matters to MOD and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Deputy Controller Establishments and Research is responsible for the overall policy governing the allocation and control of establishment resources (manpower, finance and capital facilities) to meet the needs of the defence research and equipment programme. He is responsible for the defence research programme including research by contract in industry and the universities, and for intramural research collaboration, and for co-ordination of the technology demonstrator programme. He is also chairman of the steering committee on capital expenditure.

Director Atomic Weapons Research Establishment is responsible for the management of the establishment and the conduct of its work for research and development production, including related responsibilities for safety, personnel, capital expenditure and technical co-operation with the United States of America.

Deputy Controller Warships is responsible, after acceptance of the naval staff target, for the design, development, production introduction into service, acceptance and support of all warships to meet approved MOD requirements.

Deputy Controller Aircraft is the senior civilian officer in the air systems controllerate and engages in corporate decision making on major questions concerned with the aircraft procurement programmes under his control. He is responsible for the overall management of the project officers in his organisation and is accountable to the Chief of Defence Procurement (the accounting officer for Vote 2) for the annual expenditure on projects in his area.

2. Numbers and Grades

Numbers of posts in each of the above areas at grade 3 (under secretary or equivalent), grade 4 (executive director (middle band) or equivalent) and grade 5 (assistant secretary or equivalent) levels are as follows. Because of the substantial reorganisation of the Ministry of Defence which came into effect on 2 January 1985, complementing action and computer programming in the manpower areas are still in progress. Therefore the full breakdown of staff numbers requested could not be obtained without disproportionate cost or within the time available.

Departmental Organisation

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on (a) how the new office of management and budget in his Department relates to defence secretariate 1 and (b) whether, under the new reorganisation, the head of defence secretariat 1 still takes the minutes of the Defence Council and if he is still secretary to the finance, planning and management group.

Mr. Butler: The defence secretariat divisions in the Ministry of Defence ceased to exist with the reorganisation of the Department on 2 January. The duties to which the hon. Member refers, and which were previously carried out by the head of defence secretariat 1, are now the responsibility of the head of the programme and budget division within the resources and programmes area of the office of management and budget. The new central organisation for defence is described in Cmnd. 9315, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Enhanced Radiation Artillery Shells

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department is considering enhanced radiation artillery shells as a possible replacement for current stocks of tactical nuclear weapons.

Mr. Butler: Nuclear shells for artillery deployed by the United Kingdom in support of NATO are provided by the United States of America. No proposals have been made for their modernisation.

Battlefield Nuclear Weapons

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any plans to replace current stocks of battlefield nuclear weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: No; although it is normal practice to keep under review the need to replace all United Kingdom in service weapon systems.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of maintaining the United Kingdom's current stocks of battlefield nuclear weapons.

Mr. Butler: The United Kingdom has no battlefield nuclear warheads; we do, however, provide and man delivery means for United States warheads which are held under the usual custodial arrangements. The only cost to the United Kingdom is therefore in maintaining the Lance missile system and the nuclear capable artillery. It has been the practice of successive Governments not to give information on the cost of supporting individual weapon systems.

Armed Services (Manpower)

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the Regular, Reserve and total manpower of each of the armed services in the years 1950, 1960, 1970 and 1980; and what is his forecast for 1990.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows:

RAF Pilots (Training)

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the decision to suspend, until further notice, initial fast-jet low-level training for the Royal Air Force; and if he will assess its cost-effectiveness.

Mr. Lee: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers given to the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) on 23 January 1985, at column 454.

Vehicle Security

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will give top priority to considering the improvement of the security of vehicles and their personnel, carrying funds for the armed services.

Mr. Lee: A review of the arrangements for the security of cash in transit in the armed forces has already been set in hand in parallel with the continuing police investigations into the recent armed robbery in Scotland. Any recommended changes would be implemented as soon as possible.

Greenham Common

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence why his Department has stopped repairing the outer perimeter fence at Greenham common.

Mr. Stanley: Repairs continue to be carried out as judged necessary.

Nimrod Aircraft

15. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the long-term future of those British Aerospace workers now engaged on work on Nimrod; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: I have received many representations about the position at British Aerospace, Woodford, including those from my hon. Friend, and I am aware of the skills and experience of the production and design teams at British Aerospace, Woodford. I am sorry that I am not yet in a position to make an announcement about the major servicing of the Nimrod, but hope to do so shortly.

47. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he hopes to make an announcement about Nimrod major servicing.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave on 9 January, at column 460, to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara).

Space Weapons

17. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will meet his American counterpart for the purpose of dissuading the United States of America from further research into the use of nuclear weapons in space.

Mr. Heseltine: Research into weapons is permitted under existing US-Soviet treaties, and the Soviet Union is also conducting research in this field. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made clear, however, deployment would, in view of treaty obligations, have to be a matter for negotiation.

Youth Training Scheme

18. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the results of the youth training scheme as it relates to the armed forces.

24. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the armed services youth training scheme.

Mr. Lee: The Armed Services youth training scheme continues to provide very worthwhile work and training opportunities for young unemployed people. The scheme has so far attracted over 5,000 applications, 1,400 of which have been accepted.

VE Day (40th Anniversary)

19. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any arrangements have been made for the armed forces to celebrate the 40th anniversary of Victory in Europe day.

Mr. Stanley: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House on 15 January, the form of a national commemoration is being considered, and an announcement will be made in due course.

Chemical Weapons

20. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the United Kingdom ceased to stockpile chemical weapons.

Mr. Heseltine: The United Kingdom unilaterally abandoned chemical weapons in the late 1950s.

43. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on Government policy to counteract the chemical threat from the Warsaw pact.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friends the Members for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) and for Billericay (Mr. Proctor).

44. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are any stocks of chemical weapons at United States bases in Great Britain.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

Chemical Weapons Research Establishment

21. Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the work of the chemical Weapons Research Establishment at Porton Down.

25. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the work of the chemical Weapons Research Establishment at Porton Down.

Mr. Lee: The primary role of the Chemical Defence Establishment is to carry out research and development in order to improve our defences against attack by chemical weapons. This involves the detection of chemical agents, the protection of personnel and equipment, and therapy. The establishment has other roles, including research to improve our protection against biological attack; the study of wounds with a view to improving medical understanding and hence treatment; work relating to the safe use of riot control agents; and research into screening and coloured smokes.

Cruise Missiles

22. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any recent discussion with the United States of America concerning the acquisition of sea-launched cruise missiles by Britain.

Mr. Butler: No.

29. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any cruise missiles are used for practice firing in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: No United States cruise missile test-flying takes place in the United Kingdom.

30. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any recent discussion with the United States of America concerning the acquisition of sea-launched cruise missiles by Britain.

Mr. Butler: No.

32. Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any special security regulations will be needed on the roads between the proposed cruise missile base at Molesworth and its support base facility at Alconbury.

33. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any special security regulations will be needed on the roads between the proposed cruise missile site at Molesworth and its support facility at Alconbury.

Mr. Stanley: Appropriate security measures are always taken to protect military bases and equipment. It is not at present anticipated that any additional regulations will be needed on the roads between RAF Molesworth and RAF Alconbury.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any recent discussion with the United States of America concerning the acquisition of sea-launched cruise missiles by Britain.

Mr. Butler: No.

China

23. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next intends to meet his counterpart in the People's Republic of China; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: The Chinese Minister of National Defence, Mr. Zhang Aiping, has accepted in principle an invitation to visit the United Kingdom. No dates for the visit have yet been set. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces had talks with the Ministers when he visited Peking in April last year.

Falkland Islands

26. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what policy changes he proposes in relation to the defence of the Falklands in the light of recent reports of Argentine rearmament.

Mr. Stanley: I have nothing to add to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to the hon. Member on 16 January at column 123.

49. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any changes have been made during the past two months regarding deployment relating to the Falkland Islands; and what is the latest estimate of the annual cost of defending the Falklands.

Mr. Stanley: It would not be in the public interest to provide details of changes in deployments in the South Atlantic. For the latest estimate of the running costs of the Falklands garrison, I refer the hon. Member to the reply that that I gave to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on 11 December 1984 at column 431.

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total defence expenditure on the Falklands Islands since the end of the war in 1982.

Mr. Stanley: The cost of the Falklands campaign and subsequent expenditure in 1982-83 was £780 million; it is not possible to disaggregate the campaign and post-campaign costs for that year. Provision of £624 million in 1983-84 and £684 million in 1984-85 was included in the defence budget to meet the extra costs of the Falklands garrison, the cost of replacing capital equipment lost and residual campaign costs.

Departmental Arms Control Unit

27. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the work carried out by the arms control unit in his Department.

Mr. Stanley: The defence arms control unit was formed on 2 January. It has combined and strengthened existing civilian and military expertise within the Ministry of Defence in this area. It provides the focus within the Ministry for advice to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on how best to support the Government's policy of balanced and verifiable arms control on which the lead responsibility continues to lie with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Devonshire and Dorset Regiment

28. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the regimental headquarters of the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment will be retained within the county of Devon, despite any proposals to move other military establishments from Exeter.

Mr. Lee: We have no plans to move the regimental headquarters of the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment from Devon.

Conventional Weapons

31. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent commitments Her Majesty's Government have entered into with the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation in respect of increased expenditure on conventional weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: At the meeting of NATO Defence Ministers in December 1984 my right hon. Friend and his colleagues agreed to increase substantially the level of NATO infrastructure funding and to set in hand studies within NATO aimed at producing early proposals for improvements to conventional defence. The initial results of these studies are to be considered by NATO Ministers this spring. The Government's defence expenditure plans were set out in the public expenditure White Paper 1985 (Cmnd. 9428) published on 22 January.

Privatisation

38. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what measures he has taken recently to privatise services within his Department.

Mr. Butler: My hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Lee) detailed the position as it stood last July in a reply to a question from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 10 July 1984, at column 453. Since then the royal ordnance factories have been established as a public limited company under the Companies Act and the following work has been, or is about to be, tranferred to contract:

Areas in which contracting out has taken place

Location of Service	Service/Function
A & AEE Boscombe Down	Air Traffic Control Equipment Support
RAF Quedgeley	Defence Accommodation Stores
APFS Woolwich	Warehousing
London	Printing
RMCS Shrivenham	Teaching and Research
MOD Navy	Warship Refitting
RAF St. Athan	Driver Training
Contracting out is about to take place as follows:
Naval Proof and Experimental Test Centre Chorley	Proofing of Armament Stores
Kyle of Lochalsh	Further Contracting out at the British Underwater Test Evaluation Centre
DGME Bath/DGSW Portsdown	Technical Publications
RAF Linton-on-Ouse	Aircraft Servicing and Supply

Nuclear War (Prevention)

40. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the existing level of co-operation between international armed forces to prevent the unintentional or accidental outbreak of nuclear war.

41. Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the existing level of co-operation between international armed forces to prevent the unintentional or accidental outbreak of nuclear war.

Mr. Stanley: There are stringent safeguards to ensure that nuclear weapons would be launched only if a decision were taken at the highest political level. In addition, the United States, the United Kingdom and France all have agreements with the USSR both on reducing the risk of accidental nuclear war and on "hot line" communications. These were detailed in the reply given by my predecessor my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) on 14 December 1982 at column 119.

European Fighter Aircraft

45. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make an up to date statement on the proposal for the European fighter.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) and my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins).

RAF Trainer Aircraft

46. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a decision on the RAF trainer replacement.

Mr. Butler: I hope that a final decision between the options, which still include the possibility of refurbishing the Jet Provost, will be made in the spring.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the maximum speed at maximum engine power which is required at sea level for a new Royal Air Force trainer aircraft;

(2) why the Royal Air Force specification for a new trainer has been changed from requiring a sea level speed of 240 knots to requiring a useable speed of 240 knots.

Mr. Butler: The specification for a future basic trainer aircraft for the Royal Air Force, which has not been changed, seeks a level speed of 240 knots at sea level with maximum continuous engine rating. Our evaluation of the revised bids will include, along with other important factors such as price and industrial implications, a detailed assessment, from a cost-benefit point of view, of the overall performance of each aircraft.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in reaching a final decision on the choice of aircraft for the new Royal Air Force basic trainer, he will take account of any Government subsidies enjoyed by the manufacturers of any of the overseas contenders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: A full assessment of all the relevant operational, financial, industrial and other factors will be made before a final decision is taken.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence what account he intends to take in his analysis of bids for the new Royal Air Force trainer of the extent to which aspects of the performance of the contenders exceed the minimum requirements of the specification.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave my hon. Friend earlier today.

United States (Strategic Defence Initiative)

48. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he has held in recent weeks with the United States administration over the future of its strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has had no such consultations himself in recent weeks, but my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did, of course, discuss the matter when she met President Reagan at Camp David on 22 December.

Tornado Aircraft

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total number of Tornado aircraft which have been produced; how many more are due to be produced in each of the next five years; and what is the estimated current price of each such aircraft.

Mr. Butler: The total number of Tornado aircraft on order for the United Kingdom is 385, of which 186 have been produced by 31 December 1984. Production is currently planned to continue as follows:

	Number
1985	36
1986	41
1987	44
1988	44
1989	34

The current estimated cost is £13·2 million for an interdiction strike aircraft and £16·6 million for the air defence variant.

Wintex

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the Wintex exercise schedule for February 1985 is to go ahead as planned.

Mr. Stanley: The United Kingdom will participate in Wintex-Cimex 85 as planned.

Service Personnel (Drugs)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish figures of the numbers of service personnel convicted of offences connected with drugs for each year since 1980, by service, rank and type of drug concerned.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Royal Ordanance Factories plc

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to sell his shareholding in the Royal Ordnance Factories plc.

Mr. Butler: As soon as it makes sound commercial sense so to do, but it is too early in the life of the company to determine a date.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Relocated Employees

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for how many years the Inland Revenue practice noted in SP1/85, "Income Tax: Treatment of Certain Payments to Relocated Employees", has been in operation; why no publicity was given to the practice at the time it was introduced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: Payments of the kind referred to in the Inland Revenue statement of practice, SP1/85, have never been regarded as taxable. As the Inland Revenue press release, issued on 18 January, makes clear, the practice had not previously appeared in the series of practice notes which were first introduced in 1978. It had, however, been mentioned in a number of commercial publications on tax matters, and there is no reason to believe that it was not known to employers who have provided the kind of payments covered by the practice.

More generally, since 1978 the Inland Revenue has published details of its practice in many areas. Given the great volume of the tax legislation, a judgment has to be made in each case, whether it is of sufficient importance and general interest to justify a published statement. The decision to publish SP1/85 was taken in the light of some earlier published comment, which seemed likely to create uncertainty about the correct position.

Public Sector Employment

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is (a) the total figure for United Kingdom public sector employment, (b) the figure for each principal Government Department and (c) the estimate for (a) and (b) for 1985; and what percentage of the total employed labour force was represented by the public sector in mid-1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Peter Rees: The public sector employment figures are as follows:

	Thousands	Per cent. of total employed labour force
1979	7,417	29·2
1980	7,356	29·1
1981	7,154	29·4
1982	6,992	29·1
1984	6,825	28·4

Estimates for 1985 are not yet available, but the privatisation of British Telecom will have reduced public sector employment by 240,000 or 1 per cent. of the total employed labour force. The effect of previous privatisations is shown in the regular article "Employment in the public and private sectors" (Economic Trends, March 1984).

Numbers of civil servants in post at 1 October 1984 in Great Britain by principal Government Department can be found in summaries of the Civil Service quarterly staff returns. Targets for individual Departments for 1985 are shown in table 2.17 of Cmnd. 9428 (part II)—"The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88", published on 22 January. Both these documents are available in the House of Commons Library.

Income Tax and National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Churchill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is estimated to be the revenue likely to be raised in the current financial year from the lowest 10 per cent. of wage earners (a) in income tax and (b) in national insurance contributions.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Churchill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in net take-home pay or benefit since 1979 of a married man with two children aged under 10 years who is (a) employed and in the lowest 10 per cent. of wage earners and (b) unemployed and in receipt of supplementary and other benefits.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Expenditure)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what percentage total European Economic Community expenditure has increased in each year since 1970.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Budget)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the proportion of the European Economic Community budget devoted to (a) agriculture, (b) regional development, (c) transport, (d) social fund, (e) energy (f) science and technology, (g) industry and (h) research and investment for each year since 1972.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Trustee Savings Banks

Mr. Craigen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has received any outside legal opinions on the question of ownership of the trustee savings banks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government are confident that the legal position is as stated in chapter 4 of the White Paper (Cmnd. 9415) published on 18 December. It is not normal practice to diclose from whom the Government may have sought legal advice.

Plant and Machinery (Balancing Allowances)

Mr. Grylls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of restoring the position prior to the Finance Act 1974 whereby balancing allowances were given in respect of unrelieved expenditure on plant and machinery disposed of during the accounting period.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 321]: I regret that this information is not available.

Plant and Machinery (Writing Down Allowance)

Mr. Grylls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of changing the writing down allowance on plant and machinery from 25 per cent. on the reducing balance to (a) 25 per cent. straight line and (b) 20 per cent. straight line.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 22 January 1985, c. 365]: The costs would build up over a number of years so that estimates depend crucially upon future levels of investment. Only very tentative estimates can be provided of the peak year cost which could be up to (a) £2 billion and (b) £1 billion.

Capital Transfer Tax

Mr. Cormack asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the yield from capital transfer tax in 1983-84.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 68]: £599 million.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Heating Allowances

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the chief adjudication officer has now ruled that supplementary heating allowances will be paid in Scotland.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that the chief adjudication officer has decided not to advise local adjudication officers that the exceptionally severe weather condition in the regulations was satisfied in the week ending 26 January in any part of Great Britain. This decision was based on the criteria published in paragraphs 7426-7459 and appendix 19 of the S Manual (a copy of which is in the Library), which he applied using temperature data for that week from the Meteorological Office.

Medicines (Safety)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what requirements he places on the Committee on Safety of Medicines to carry out independent investigation on products referred to it and to check the veracity of the manufacturer's research conclusions; and what facilities are made available to the committee to enable it to do so.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The committee is not required to carry out medical or scientific tests of its own on products referred to it. An applicant for a product licence must submit to the licensing authority, amongst other information, copies of reports and evaluations of any experimental and biological studies and of any clinical, preclinical or laboratory studies of the product which are relevant to the assessment of its safety, efficacy and quality, together with references to relevant publications. Where the licensing authority seeks the advice of the committee on applications the committee, supported by its professional and administrative secretariat, assesses all submitted reports, studies and publications. It also considers all other evidence which it believes might bear on the issue and can consult other experts. Where, as a result, the committee is not satisfied with the evidence submitted, it can specify what further studies or data it would require to enable it to give further consideration to the application. Similar procedures are followed by the committee if new evidence comes to light which suggests that variation or revocation of a licence may be necessary. for example, on grounds of safety.

Unemployed Persons

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek to amend the relevant legislation to allow those who take up seasonal work for more than three successive seasons to claim unemployment benefit at other times provided that they are properly registered as available for work at their local employment offices.

Mr. Whitney: A seasonal worker may receive unemployment benefit during his off season, but only if he satisfies a condition additional to those which all unemployment benefit claimants have to meet. This condition is that he has had, or can reasonably expect to obtain, a substantial amount of employment during that off season. This condition is designed to ensure that unemployment benefit is not paid to those seasonal workers who are not in employment during their off seasons. There is no practical way of distinguishing between the voluntary and involuntary seasonal worker —registration at an employment office would not be a test in itself. We therefore have no proposals for altering these arrangements. I would add that these regulations do not apply to supplementary benefit; an unemployed seasonal worker can receive benefit if otherwise eligible, though there are special rules about income earned during the on season.

Yellow Fever Vaccinations

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the places in the Wessex health region where yellow fever vaccinations are available.

Mr. John Patten: The following centres in the Wessex health region are designated to provide yellow fever vaccinations for members of the public:

The Basingstoke district hospital, the Avebury child health clinic, Bournemouth, and the central health clinic in Southampton.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the present provision of yellow fever vaccinations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Yes, but there are difficulties, which we hope to resolve shortly.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give further consideration to allowing yellow fever vaccinations to be carried out by general practitioners who wish to provide such a service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Possible improvements to present arrangements are currently under review and if these prove practicable we hope to announce some changes shortly.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many yellow fever vaccinations have been carried out in each health region each year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally.

Foot Health

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what study his Department has made of the findings of the survey of foot health conducted by the Wessex health authority; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have read the first volume of the report with interest and look forward to seeing the second. It will be for health authorities themselves to consider whether, in their own circumstances, any action is required. I understand the authors are considering how the report can best be given wider circulation.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what health education provision exists in relation to foot care for (a) children, (b) pre-retirement adults, (c) the elderly and (d) women; and if he is satisfied with existing provision.

Mr. John Patten: Foot health education is carried out by local National Health Service health education units and the Health Education Council. Leaflets, foot care education programmes and seminars feature among the initiatives sponsored locally. The council has funded studies aimed at developing the health education and preventive roles of the professions allied to medicine, including chiropodists, is developing a programme of education for health in old age which includes the maintenance of mobility, and produces leaflets on foot health.

Chiropodists

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many chiropodists are employed by the National Health Service; if he considers the number to be adequate; and if he has had any representations to the contrary.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There were 2,392 whole-time equivalent chiropodists employed in the National Health Service in England at 30 September 1983. Figures for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for those countries. There is undoubtedly some shortage of chiropodists in the NHS and we occasionally receive representations about the adequacy of particular local provision.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has given any consideration to the evidence submitted by the executive director of John Groom's Association for the Disabled to the Social Security Advisory Committee about the proposals for changing board and lodgings payments of supplementary benefit; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We shall be giving full consideration to all the representations submitted to the Social Security Advisory Committee before finalising our proposals.

Women Patients (Treatment)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the National Health Service units, centres, clinics and hospitals where women patients can be guaranteed treatment by female staff; and which services are provided in each of these places.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally.

Departmental Publications

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what sums have been expended by his Department on documents and publications issued free of charge to (a) doctors, (b) pharmacists and (c) other persons or bodies in each of the last two years; and what were the sums expended in (i) 1970, (ii) 1975 and (iii) 1980, in cash and at constant prices taking 1970 as the base.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current annual cost of the Camberwell resettlement unit; what is the cost of other such units; what plans he has for these units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The information about the cost of Camberwell resettlement unit and the other units is as follows:

Annual expenditure 1983-84 (latest available figure, excluding major capital works)

Camberwell	2,549,447
Brighton	203,490
West End House, Soho	554,016

* Denotes combined resettlement unit and re-establishment centre.

We hope to make a statement about the future of resettlement units soon.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what date he intends that the Camberwell resettlement unit will be closed by his Department.

Mr. Whitney: Camberwell resettlement unit will close on 27 September 1985.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total cost in 1983-84 to his Department of maintaining the 23 resettlement units provided by his Department; and what is his estimate of the cost per capita for each occupant of the units.

Mr. Whitney: The total cost of maintaining the 23 resettlement units in 1983-84 was £12,208,806. This includes the cost of re-establishment centres where the sites are shared. The average annual cost per occupied bed in 1983-84 was estimated to be £6,450.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate how many persons staying in the 23 resettlement units provided by his Department, on the night of 30 November 1984, had formerly been an inpatient of a mental hospital or a mental handicap hospital; and how many of the persons staying at the Camberwell resettlement unit on that night had formerly been in such hospitals.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinsion asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many men, and how many women, are currently living in his Department's reception centres; and if he will give comparable figures for each year since 1974;

(2) how many persons stayed in the 23 resettlement units provided by his Department on the night of 30 November 1984; how many of those were eligible for housing accommodation from a local housing authority by virtue of being vulnerable through old-age, mental illness or handicap, physical disability or pregnancy, under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977; and what arrangements exist between each of the 23 resettlement units and local housing authorities for the rehousing of those homeless people who are vulnerable under the Act;

(3) how many beds were provided in each of the 23 resettlement units during the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available; and what was the average rate of occupancy for each unit during the same period;

(4) during the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available, how many individuals were provided, when leaving each of the 23 resettlement units, with accommodation under the following categories: (a) local authority tenancies, (b) housing association tenancies and (c) local authority part III accommodation.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Heart Transplants

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the expert evaluation on the costs and benefits of heart transplants will not be published before the early spring when it was to have been received by him at the end of 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The report was submitted to the Department's chief scientist at the end of 1984 and, in accordance with the normal practice of peer review, referred to external scientific referees. Their comments, together with those from within the Department, were discussed with the authors who are considering whether they wish to make any final minor revisions before the report is published.

Hospitals (Ethical Committees)

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospitals have ethical committees to consider research projects before they commence.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Depo Provera

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in view of the World Health Organisation's preliminary results of its study on the long-term effects of Depo Provera, he has given further consideration to the long-term licence for Depo Provera; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We shall consider the full text of the preliminary results, and the final report of the study, when they are available.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received a copy of "Families Rent Apart", published by the Child Poverty Action Group and Youthaid on the effect on families with working children living at home of the reductions in the parents' entitlement to housing benefit; if he will meet the authors of the pamphlet; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We have not received a copy of the pamphlet and we have no plans to meet the pamphlet's authors.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the best available estimate of the number of families whose entitlement to housing benefit has been reduced as a result of the introduction in April 1984 of reductions for parents whose children are working and living at home; and what is the best available estimate of the number of families now claiming housing benefit who have working children living at home.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not available in the precise form requested. The table gives estimates relating to households containing non-dependants aged 18 to pension age affected by the increases in the housing benefit non-dependant deductions in April 1984.

Thousands, Great Britain

	Standard cases	Certificated cases (Those in receipt of supplementary benefit)
Household contains one or more non-dependants aged:
18-20	80	225
21-pension age	275

An estimated 115,000 households were affected by the introduction of a non-dependant deduction for 16-17 year olds from November 1984. More recent information relating to the numbers of households affected by these non-dependant deductions is not available.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many day-care centres for single homeless people there are; and what financial support they received in 1983-84 from his Department.

Mr. Jonn Patten: The Department does not hold any statistical figures indicating the number of day care centres for single homeless people and there is no record of these centres receiving financial support for the year 1983-84 from this Department.

Epilim

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will take steps to secure the inclusion in the British data sheet for Epilim of the psychiatric adverse reactions currently included in the United States Food and Drugs Agency data sheet;

(2) if he will take steps to secure the inclusion in the British data sheet for Epilim of the precautions regarding infertility currently included in the United States Food and Drugs Agency data sheet.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 21 January 1985, c. 324-5]: For prescription medicines such as Epilim, the product licence holder is responsible for producing a data sheet which must state, amongst other things, any essential warnings that the licensing authority included on the licence. If subsequently it is considered that additional warnings are necessary on grounds of safety, these can be added either voluntarily by the licence holder or, under the procedure of the Medicines Act, compulsorily by the licensing authority. The warnings issued by licensing authorities in other countries are taken fully into account by the licensing authority but are not in themselves conclusive grounds for altering the United Kingdom licence.

The licence holder of Epilim is currently reviewing the psychiatric adverse reactions reported in association with Epilim and, in the light of the evidence available and in consultation with the licensing authority, will be considering amendments to its data sheet.

Neither the licensing authority nor the licence holder has evidence of any effects on fertility that would justify an amendment to the data sheet.

Invalidity Pension

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications for (a) non-contributory invalidity pension and (b) housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension were received in each month during 1984; how many of each were successful; and how many applications for housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension failed on account of (i) the incapacity test and (ii) the household duties test.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 326]: I regret that one of the figures given in my reply was incorrect. Over the last year 977 married women claiming housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension failed the incapacity test.

NHS (Achievements and Objectives)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the principal achievements of the National Health Service in 1984;

(2) what are his principal objectives for the National Health Service in 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1985, c. 169-70]: Although detailed figures for 1984 are not yet available to us, we expect the substantial increases of the previous five years in the number of patients treated in England to have been maintained. We also expect the service to have achieved further improvements in the quality of care, particularly for our priority groups — the mentally ill, the mentally handicapped, and the elderly. I regret that no precise measure of the growth of the service will be available until we have the full figures.

Planned expenditure in the National Health Service is up in 1984-85 by more than 7 per cent. over the previous year. Our latest figures show that in the year to March 1984 hospital inpatient waiting lists fell by some 33,000. In the six months following the launch in February 1984 of a new campaign on kidney donation, kidney transplants rose by 40 per cent. over the equivalent period in 1983. We funded improvements in primary care in inner cities and promoted better joint planning of local services among the statutory and voluntary bodies and the development of community care. Health authorities were asked to take urgent action to improve services for drug misusers. In line with our policy on prevention, over 30 districts which were previously without a health education service established one. Also in 1984, seven major capital schemes, costing £5 million or more each and providing a total of 1,380 new beds and full supporting services, were completed and 11 major schemes were started on site.

The service's drive for better management continued in 1984. Of the 13 general managers now appointed by regional health authorities, 12 were in post by the end of the year; 63 of the 192 district health authorities and five of the eight special health authorities had also appointed their general managers. Progress was made in the development of management budgeting in four demonstration districts. Latest figures indicate that NHS manpower was lower at 30 September 1984 than a year previously whilst we expect the number of patients treated to have continued to rise. Health authorities identified current expenditure savings of about 1 per cent. in 1984-85 through cost improvement programmes which released about £100 million to improve patient services. We also published six reports of Rayner efficiency scrutinies carried out by staff in the service which identified potential recurrent savings of up to £40 million a year plus substantial scope for one-off savings. Following instructions to health authorities in September 1983, health authorities are making very worthwhile savings by putting their domestic, catering and laundry services out to competitive tender. The savings achieved by all these various means release resources for better patient care.

In 1985 we shall be looking for these encouraging trends of the past year to continue and for further improvements in the quantity and quality of service provided to the public. The Government have already announced that we shall be spending over £600 million more on the NHS in England in 1985-86. We shall also be examining carefully health authorities' plans for service development and for the better use of financial, manpower and capital resources. We shall be publishing a Green Paper on the development of primary care services. We shall continue to promote joint planning and the care in the community programme. We hope that by the end of 1985 all districts will have, or have access to, a health education service. Seven more major capital schemes are expected to be completed in 1985.

We shall be looking to health authorities: to complete the appointment of general managers at regional and district level and the revised management structures to complement this and to carry forward the establishment of the general management function into hospitals and other units; to identify an increased level of savings through their cost improvement programmes; and to complete a further round of efficiency scrutinies. We intend no overall rise in NHS manpower but will achieve growth and improvement in services by better productivity. We shall be giving priority to improving training for management in the service and to bettering the quality and use of management information. Management budgets will be extended to a further limited number of demonstration districts. The new family practitioner committees, directly accountable to my right hon. Friend, will come into being in 1985 and we shall be looking to them to play a major part in promoting and improving primary health care.

ENVIRONMENT

Empty Dwellings

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the percentage of empty dwellings in (a) the public sector, (b) the voluntary sector, (c) the private sector and (d) those owned and controlled by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Gow: The available estimates for April 1984, derived from English local authorities' housing investment programme returns, are as follows:

	per cent.
Local authorities	2·3
Housing associations	3·6
Other public sector	6·8
Total public sector	2·7
Private Sector	4·2

"Other public sector" includes housing owned by new towns, Government Departments, county councils and other public agencies.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what amount of the Housing Corporation's gross expenditure in 1983-84 was accounted for by value added tax.

Mr. Gow: £20 million.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the £30 million value added tax paid from the Housing Corporation's 1984-85 gross expenditure was accounted for by the Budget changes incorporated into the Finance Act 1984; and if resources to the corporation were increased to take account of the changes.

Mr. Gow: It is estimated that the extension of VAT to building alterations will account for £15 million of the Housing Corporation's gross expenditure in 1984-85. The Government have given approval for an equivalent amount of index-linked private finance to be used for shared ownership projects in 1984-85.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many jobs created in the London Docklands Development Corporation area since July 1981 have moved into existing building or buildings commenced prior to July 1981.

Sir George Young: Of the 3,619 new jobs created in the LDDC area since July 1981—excluding 574 Inner Urban Areas Act related jobs created over the same period — 2,374 are in existing buildings or buildings commenced prior to July 1981, a substantial proportion of which have been renovated since this date.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 24 January, Official Report, column 484, if he will give the date of the meeting of the London Docklands Development Corporation at which the application for a grant or contract to Inter-Action was approved; and what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that that decision was in accordance with the recommendation of the House of Lords Select Committee on the London Docklands Development Corporation Order, Paragraph 8.7 (HL 198 of 1980) and with his reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South of 9 January, Official Report, column 473.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Local Authority Expenditure (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the outturn of gross revenue expenditure and income was for each London borough and the city of London by service and for all services in 1982-83.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the level of outturn capital expenditure, loan charges and net outstanding debt was in the city of London and each London borough in 1982-83.

Mr. Waldegrave: This information requested is as follows:

* Based on outturn returns provided by local authorities. Gross capital expenditure is all capital expenditure charged to capital accounts or charged direct to revenue or other funds. Where an authority undertakes agency work for another authority the expenditure is included by both authorities.

† Based on outturn returns provided by local authorities. Loan charges consist of repayments of principal and interest and include loan charges paid to GLC in respect of transferred dwellings.

‡ Local authorities' own debt whether administered by themselves or not.

Unitary Development (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, in making his decision to replace the structure/local plan system in London with unitary plans, what information he had before him concerning (a) the anticipated duration of the new planning processes compared with the existing system, (b) the number of staff required in the London boroughs and his own department and (c) the costs of preparing, consulting on and publicising and inquiring into 33 unitary development plans; and if he will place this information on costs and organisation in the Library.

Sir George Young: In considering the new planning arrangements for London, the Government took into account the time taken to process the Greater London development plan. The introduction of unitary development plans will build on the extensive experience of London boroughs and will provide a simpler process for them than separate procedures for structure and local plans. Although some additional departmental staff may be needed, these will be met from within the overall planned allocations of the Department. Staffing for the London boroughs themselves are matters for them to decide. As the scale of work for the introduction of unitary development plans will vary from area to area, it would have been inappropriate to undertake the detailed calculations referred to.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many respondents to the consultation paper, "Streamlining the Cities: Housing", proposed that the nomination rights to dwellings in a Londonwide mobility scheme and in the Greater London council's seaside and country homes be vested in the Secretary of State.

Sir George Young: The consultation paper proposed that voluntary arrangements should be established to maintain opportunities for mobility and for access to the seaside and country homes. In response to comments made by consultees, we have announced our intention that both should instead be the subject of statutory schemes.

Air Pollution

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the review of air pollution control legislation will be completed.

Mr. Waldegrave: The timing of completion of the review will depend on the response to a consultation paper on air pollution control legislation which we intend to publish later this year.

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be able to implement the findings of the review of air pollution control legislation.

Mr. Waldegrave: The findings of the review, including the outcome of the proposed consultation exercise, will themselves determine the timing and manner of implementation.

Stornoway Airport

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people have been employed in construction work at Stornoway airport during phase 1 of the redevelopment of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation base; how many of the construction force were local; and what types of employment the local workers participated in.

Sir George Young: Numbers varied as works progressed. When construction was in full swing between April and June 1984, the labour force totalled 131, of whom 91 were engaged locally. These included carpenters and bricklayers, plant operators, electricians, asphalt gang labourers and site staff.

Local Authorities (Legal Proceedings)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local authorities which have commenced, or have given notice of their intention to commence, legal proceedings against him in respect of the administration of block grant, expenditure guidance and grant holdback whether by way of an action for judicial review, for a declaration or otherwise since 1 April 1981; and in each instance if he will summarise the grounds upon which the actions were stated to have been brought and, where appropriate, the outcome.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information is as follows:

Authority	Grounds	Outcome
London boroughs of Brent, Camden, Hackney, Hounslow, Tower Hamlets and Waltham Forest	Decisions to reduce 1980-81 rate support grant unlawful	Decision quashed on ground that Secretary of State had failed to hear late representations

Authority	Grounds	Outcome
London boroughs of Camden and Hackney	Further decisions on 1980-81 rate support grant unlawful	Application for judicial review, and Camden's appeal dismissed
London borough of Hackney	1984-85 expenditure guidance unlawful	Heard March 1984; application for judicail review dismissed. Appeal to be heard
Leicester City Council	Notice of 1985-86 rate limit invalid	Application for judicial review dismissed
Bradford Metropolitan Borough Council	1985-86 expenditure guidance unlawful	Intention to proceed notified
Derbyshire County Council	1985-86 expenditure guidance unlawful	To be heard
London boroughs of Hammersmith and Fulham	Secretary of State misdirected himself in refusing disregard	To be heard
London borough of Lambeth	1984-85 expenditure guidance unlawful	To be heard
Nottinghamshire County Council	1985-86 expenditure guidance and 1984-85 grant-related expenditure unlawful	To be heard

Inner City Partnership Funds

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the projected totals of inner city partnership funds to be allocated for 1985-86, by authority, listing separately the public and voluntary sectors.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South-East (Mr. Lightbown) on 14 January at columns 1-2. Until detailed inner area programmes have been agreed for the partnerships, I cannot estimate the proportions going to the different authorities or the public and voluntary sectors.

Local Government Staff (Salaries)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the value of salaries for local government employees for 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: The aggregate pay bill for local government white collar and manual employees in 1982-83 was £6,310 million. In 1983-84, it was £6,697 million. These figures exclude teachers, lecturers, police and firemen.

Urban Development Corporations

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will provide an analysis of the figures given in table 3.8.7, of Cmnd. 9428 between the two urban development corporations;

(2) if he will extend table 3.8.8 of Cmnd. 9428 to 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Sir George Young: An analysis of the figures published in table 3.8.7 of Cmnd. 9428 — "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88"— is attached for the years up to 1985-86. Details of the allocations for 1986-87 and 1987-88 are not yet available.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the 1985-86 housing investment programme allocation for Leeds metropolitan district council is intended to cover the cost of repair and improvement of prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend takes account of many factors in determining individual authorities' HIP allocations. It is not possible to identify a precise amount which relates to the need for expenditure on prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much of the 1985-86 housing investment programmes allocation is intended to meet the costs of repairs and improvement of prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings.

Sir George Young: It is not possible to say how much of the total housing investment programme resources were allocated to meet the costs of repairs and improvements to PRC dwellings since HIP allocations to individual authorities are determined partly by the generalised needs index (GNI) and partly by the local discretionary element, which enables my right hon. Friend to take into account a whole range of local factors, including, where appropriate, the need for expenditure on prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings. The defective dwellings indicator, which was introduced for the 1985-86 allocations to reflect the need for expenditure on prefabricated reinforced concrete houses, takes up 3 per cent. of total GNI.

Manchester City Council—Manchester Ship Canal Company

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has had from the leader of Manchester city council about his recent public statement in which he questioned the rationale of the continued connection between Manchester city council and the Manchester Ship Canal Company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have received representations from Councillor Stringer, and in reply have reiterated my view that, whatever the long-standing relationship between his council and the Ship Canal Company, it needs to be reviewed from time to time in the light of new circumstances. I look for such a review to take place in the context of the local study on the future of the upper reaches of the ship canal which is in hand at the moment. The city council and the canal company are both taking part in that study, and I understand that a report is due later this year.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average length of time now taken by his Department (a) between the lodging and the hearing of planning appeals and (b) between the hearing and the decision.

Mr. Macfarlane: Statistics of the average times taken for planning appeals are not kept; instead, median times are used. The median times for Secretary of State inquiries during October 1984 were 27 weeks from receipt to inquiry and approximately 18 weeks from inquiry to decision. For inspectors inquiries, the median was 22 weeks from receipt to Inquiry and five weeks from Inquiry to decision; and for inspectors informal hearings, 20 weeks from start to hearing and four weeks from hearing to decision. Only 16 per cent. of appeals are now dealt with by inquiries; the remainder are dealt with by written representations, which on the whole is a faster procedure.

Radio Stations

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning applications have been submitted to local planning authorities relating to cellular radio base stations; how many of these have been approved and refused, respectively; and how many are pending.

Mr. Macfarlane: Local planning authorities' quarterly returns to us on planning applications made to them do not provide information at this level of detail on the nature of the development concerned.

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to require communications systems companies to obtain planning permission before erecting radio transmission masts with ancillary buildings and fenced compounds.

Mr. Macfarlane: Most such developments aleady require specific planning permission. I have no plans to relax this requirement in the case of ancillary buildings or compounds, but I propose certain relaxations in respect of some types of minor telecommunications apparatus. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 25 October 1984, at columns 689-90, which outlined our intentions in this area.

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the environmental safeguards relating to the erection of radio transmission masts and ancillary buildings, particularly in green belt areas.

Mr. Macfarlane: Yes. Radio masts installations generally require specific planning permission, and the local planning authority dealing with an application will have regard to the normal considerations, including green belt policies. Our policy for the protection of the green belt was reaffirmed in circular 14/84, and remains unchanged. Under our current proposals to amend the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977, some small masts will not require specific planning applications, but telecommunications operators will be required to abide by conditions in their telecommunications licences designed to safeguard the environment.

Water Authorities

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr, Official Report, 25 January, column 555, on what date the letter was sent to the chairman of the English water authorities; and on what date the order he referred to was laid before the House.

Mr. Macfarlane: The dates on the letters were 7 January—all except Thames—and 23 January—Thames. The order was laid on 24 January.

Public Sector Housing Management

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to improve the professional quality of public sector housing management.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend intends to provide funding, starting with the next academic year, for up to 15 post-graduate studentships a year in housing management. The studentships will be available in England and Wales for approved full-time post-graduate courses of two years' duration, which meet the professional standards of the Institute of Housing.

The new diploma of housing course at the London School of Economics meets these criteria and will be approved by my right hon. Friend for the studentships. It has been developed in consultation with the Institute of Housing and will, in our view, contribute to raising standards in public housing management. The first year will be largely academic in content; most of the second year will be spent working with selected housing authorities.

The studentships will provide for maintenance and fees in the first year, and normally for fees only in the second year, when the students are working with the housing authorities.

My right hon. Friend will give careful consideration to making studentships available for further courses which may be developed and meet the criteria.

Norfolk Broads (Livestock Grazing)

Mr. Ryder asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statment on the proposal for an experimental scheme to support livestock grazing in the Broads area.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Yes. I am pleased to announce that approval in principle has now been given for a three-year experimental scheme in the Broads to be operated by the Countryside Commission, in conjunction with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, under which payments will be made to farmers and landowners who agree to keep their land in grazing use. The scheme will be introduced in time for the 1985 grazing season. I have already announced, on 27 November 1984, at column 793, an addition of £2 million to the Countryside Commission's grant-in-aid for 1985-86, part of which will be available to finance half the costs of the scheme. The remaining half will be met by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

I believe that this proposal presents an excellent opportunity to integrate the interests of agriculture and conservation in the Broads area and should prove a flexible and effective means towards safeguarding this nationally important and unique landscape.

Home Improvement Grants

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list giving the names of those local authorities known by his Department as having suspended discretionary home improvement grants during 1984; and what representations he has received so far concerning the likelihood of these authorities lifting their moratoriums for the financial year 1985-86.

Sir George Young: Local authorities are responsible for administering the home improvement grant system and the Department does not collate or publish information on the grant approval practices of individual authorities. My right hon. Friend has received no representations about the specific policies of individual local authorities in 1985-86.

Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Dwellings

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department will conclude its discussions with the National House Building Council to establish agreed standards of repairs to the various types of prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Gow: The National House Building Council—NHBC—has agreed that it will set up arrangements under which

(1) methods of repairing prefabricated reinforced concrete (PRC) houses of types designated under the Housing Defects Act will be assessed;

(2) works of repair by an approved method will be inspected while they are in progress; and

(3) a warranty for two years in respect of the repairs will be given by the designer or repairer and guaranteed by the NHBC, which will then provide insurance in respect of the repairs for a further eight years.

The details of the arrangements are being finalised in consultation with the relevant Departments.

From discussions with representatives of building societies, I am confident that houses repaired under these arrangements will generally be acceptable to building societies as security for lending, subject to the usual requirements when a society considers lending on mortgage in any particular case.

As soon as the arrangements are finalised, the Department intends to consult the local authority associations urgently and following that to write to local authorities to inform them of the arrangements and of how they will affect the administration of the scheme of assistance under the Act. The Scottish and Welsh Offices will be taking similar action. But I expect that it will be possible for methods of repair to be received for appraisal shortly, leading to approval for warranty as soon thereafter as practicable.

Housing Defects Act

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what discussions he has had with building societies about the operation of the Housing Defects Act; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what undertakings he has received from building societies about the mortgageability of houses in categories named in the Housing Defects Act;

(3) what information he has as to those categories of housing which, prior to the passing of the Housing Defects Act, were difficult to mortgage on account of structural defects, real or potential, and which have become mortgageable since the passing of the Act.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his answer, 20 December 1984, c. 263]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I have given today to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price).

Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Dwellings

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of discussions between his Department and the Building Societies Association relating to the future mortgageability of prefabricated reinforced concrete homes designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his answer, 9 January 1985, c. 474]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I have given today to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price).

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if Her Majesty's Government will take steps to underwrite a warranty scheme for homes covered by the Housing Defects Act;

(2) if any progress has been made on an approved warranty scheme for homes covered by the Housing Defects Act.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his answer, 9 January 1985, c. 480]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I have given today to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price).

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest expected date of completion of the Falkland Islands airport including the ancillary Army provision; and how this compares with the original date.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his answer, 28 January 1985, c. 4]: I expect the main runway to be ready for use in April 1985 and the remaining airfield facilities by about February 1986. These dates are the same as those announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 27 June 1983 at column 345. The further construction work at Mount Pleasant, which consists largely of facilities for the Army and which was announced on 21 September 1984, should be complete in early 1987.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest estimate of the cost of the Falkland Islands airport and ancillary provision; and how this compares with the original estimate.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his answer, 28 January 1985, c. 4]: As announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 21 September 1984, the original, June 1983 cost of the airfield works at £215 million was increased to £250 million mainly to provide for joint service facilities in the interests of overall economy. At the same time, he announced the award of new contracts to the value of £119 million to enable the garrison to be concentrated at the Mount Pleasant site. The latest costs of these two elements are respectively £260 million and £116 million. All the estimates for the airfield works include £10 million for MOD supplied navigation aids and communication equipment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Jury Vetting

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if he will list his powers to authorise the vetting of juries in criminal cases.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Islington South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 28 January 1985.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if he will list the criteria that are applied in the vetting of juries in criminal cases when such vetting is authorised by him.

The Attorney-General: I issued guidelines on this matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions on 31 July 1980. A copy is in the Library of the House. The guidelines are strictly observed.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General on what grounds a member of a jury panel would not be permitted to serve on a jury following vetting authorised by him in a criminal case.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 9 of the guidelines that I issued to the Director of Public Prosecutions on 31 July 1980. A copy of those guidelines is in the Library of the House.

Public Records

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Attorney-General whether the Lord Chancellor will now take steps to implement those aspects of the report of the Wilson committee relating to public records designed to reduce obstacles to research in some areas of contemporary history.

The Attorney-General: In a White Paper (Cmnd. 8204, March 1982) the Government listed those recommendations of the Wilson committee that were acceptable. Most have already been or are now being implemented; others will be when resources permit or a suitable legislative opportunity occurs.

TRANSPORT

Seat Belts

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the Government will be responding to comments about rear seat belts for cars in the Transport Committee's recently published report on road safety; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I am considering the report and will respond as soon as possible.

Coal Industry Dispute (British Rail)

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated loss of revenue caused to British Rail up to 15 January as a direct consequence of the miners' dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Ridley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 28 January at column 11.

Train Crash (Micheldever)

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the circumstances surrounding the train crash at Popham tunnel, Micheldever, near Winchester, on the morning of Sunday 27 January.

Mr. Ridley: Shortly before 5 am on Saturday 26 January a Bournemouth to Woking electric multiple-unit train conveying railway staff ran into a minor chalk slip near Micheldever. The train's collector shoes, which collect traction current from the third rail, were damaged and the train immobilised. A diesel-electric locomotive was sent from Worting junction, near Basingstoke, to assist the train, but collided heavily with it. The driver of the locomotive and his assistant were trapped in the cab and suffered leg injuries. Four BR employees and a Post Office sorter, all passengers on the train, were treated in hospital for minor injuries. An inquiry will be held by the Railway Inspectorate. Evidence will be heard in public and there will be a published report.

Public Transport (Revenue Support)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Transport what guidance he has given to the metropolitan county councils under the provisions of the Transport Act 1983 about protected levels of revenue support to public transport in the next financial year.

Mr. Ridley: I have given these authorities guidance under the provisions of section 4(5) of the Transport Act 1983 that the maximum amounts of revenue grants which it would in my opinion be appropriate for them to make in the year beginning 1 April 1985 are as follows:

Authority	Protected Expenditure Level (PEL) £ million
Greater Manchester	45
Merseyside	39
South Yorkshire	32
Tyne and Wear	21
West Midlands	27
West Yorkshire	41

EMPLOYMENT

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment how long applicants for the enterprise allowance scheme in (a) the Huddersfield area, (b) the Kirklees area, (c) West Yorkshire and (d) the Yorkshire and Humberside region currently have to wait on average before being granted an appointment at the initial information seminar; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The frequency of information seminars is determined by the level of demand, and in Huddersfield and Kirklees, West Yorkshire and the Yorkshire and Humberside region potential applicants for the enterprise allowance scheme have on average to wait no more than one week to attend a seminar.

I am pleased that as a result of the increase in the rate of take-on from 1 May 1984 we have been able to eliminate the delays that were facing potential applicants earlier in the year. This successful and worthwhile scheme will be further extended on 1 April 1985 to assist up to another 62,500 unemployed people in 1985-86 to create their own jobs and start up in business.

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in (a) the Yorkshire and Humberside region, (b) West Yorkshire and (c) the employment division area covering Huddersfield are currently in receipt of the enterprise allowance; and how many people in each area have now completed one year on the scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 22 January 1985 the number of people in receipt of the enterprise allowance in Yorkshire and Humberside and West Yorkshire was as follows:

	Number
Yorkshire and Humberside	3,662
West Yorkshire	1,920

No separate figures are available for the Huddersfield area, but these are included in the Manpower Services Commission's employment division area centred on Dewsbury which covers Bradford, Halifax, Dewsbury and Huddersfield. The number of people currently receiving the enterprise allowance in that areas is 877.

On the same date the number of people who had completed 12 months on the scheme in these areas was as follows:

	Number
Yorkshire and Humberside	1,825
Dewsbury	460

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment how long applicants for the enterprise allowance scheme in (a) Burnley, (b) Lancashire and (c) England as a whole have to wait on an average before being given an interview at the initial information seminar.

Mr. Alan Clark: Potential applicants for the enterprise allowance scheme in Burnley, Lancashire and England as a whole have to wait on average no more than one week to attend an information seminar.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committees

Mr. Mason asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the overseas visits undertaken by the 14 Select Committees since 1979; for what purpose they were undertaken; how many officers and advisers accompanied each delegation; and what have been the total costs incurred by each Committee on these visits.

Mr. Biffen: I shall reply to the right hon. Member as soon as possible.

WALES

Dairy Farmers

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many dairy farmers in Wales with less than 40 cows have left the industry in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In the year ending 31 December 1984 the number of registrations relating to herds of less than 40 cows decreased by 241 in Wales. This figure reflects a number of acceptances under the outgoers scheme. In the same period there were 97 new registrations associated with herds of less than 40 cows.

Renal Dialysis

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to achieve a target of 40 new patients per annum per million of the population in Wales who are suffering from end-stage renal failure; if he can give any indication of a speed-up in the process; if he will indicate what his target figure is for 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The resources capable of accepting a referral level of 45 to 50 new patients per million population per annum in Wales will be available as from next month. Subsidiary renal units to be made available this year should increase referral rates to take up the capacity provided. Our aim is to ensure as soon as possible that no patient who can benefit from dialysis will be denied it through lack of facilities.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will consider the establishment in Wales of an independent inquiry into the treatment of end-stage renal failure; if he will indicate what policies his Department recommends in circumstances where there is insufficient provision for patients in need; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Our strategy for Wales was set out in our replies to the hon. Gentleman on 5 December 1983, at columns 22-23, 26 January 1984, at column 706, and 21 February 1984, at column 504. Our programme for achieving this strategy is ahead of schedule. An independent inquiry is unnecessary.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied that all patients in Wales needing treatment for end-stage renal failure receive such treatment; if he is satisfied with the referral rate by general practitioners and other consultants to renal consultants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I am not satisfied that all such patients have been referred for treatment; that is why we are making resources available to ensure that referral rates are not constrained by a shortage of facilities.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will consider setting up in Wales a limited number of renal units to cater for the problems created by difficult kidney patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Difficult patients can dialyse at the two existing units in Cardiff and Bodelwyddan, and will be able to at the Morriston unit which will open next month. Patients who experience difficulty will also be able to dialyse under supervision in the two subsidiary renal units to be opened this year in Bangor and Carmarthen.

Housing Expenditure

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales how the figures of £107 million in housing capital expenditure in 1985-86, (Cmnd. 9428-11, paragraph 28) compares with 1984-85; what estimate has been made of capital receipts for 1985-86; how that compares with 1984-85; and what assumptions he has made in relation to housing capital expenditure in arriving at the figure of £130 million for housing in 1987-88 in table 3.16 of Cmnd. 9428-11.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The figure of £107 million, quoted in paragraph 28 of Cmnd. 9428-11, represents the provision made for 1985-86 in respect of net housing capital expenditure in Wales by local authorities and the Housing Corporation. The comparable provision made for 1984-85 was £92·5 million.

Local authority capital receipts for 1985-86 are estimated to total £78·5 million compared with the estimate of £98 million for 1984-85, quoted in paragraph 20 of Cmnd. 9143-11.

Housing is one of the services which are treated as a block for public expenditure purposes, within which my right hon. Friend has discretion to apportion the total provision as he chooses. Following each annual public expenditure review, my right hon. Friend reaches firm and detailed decisions for the forthcoming financial year. The allocation of resources for the succeeding years is indicative only at that stage and reflects the apportionment made for the first year. The assumption made about housing capital expenditure for both 1986-87 and 1987-88 is, therefore, that it will remain at roughly the same level as in 1985-86.

Local Authority Finance

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the latest figures estimated for 1984-85 for each district council in Wales of (a) the total capital allocation, (b) the total capital allocation specifically for housing, (c) the total probable capital expenditure outturn and (d) the total probable capital outturn for housing; and if he will publish similar figures for each of the five preceding years adjusted to 1984-85 prices.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Free School Meals

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the number of children receiving free school meals for each year since 1974, the proportion of children in attendance this represents, and Government expenditure on free school meals in cash and cost terms using 100 as a base for 1974.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Free pupil meals		Index of estimated expenditure* on free pupil meals in cash terms
	Number (thousand)	Number as percentage of pupils present	Cash terms	Real terms†
1974-75	694	8·9	100	100
1975-76	728	9·2	132	105
1976-77	779	9·8	160	113
1977-78	927	11·8	219	135

1982-83	964	13·9	396	136
1983-84	1,075	15·9	449	147

* The gross expenditure on all meals by local education authorities has been apportioned to free pupils in the ratio of free pupil meals to total pupil meals.

† Cash terms have been converted into real terms using the GDP deflator at market prices.

Graduate Diplomas in Music

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the colleges of further education in the north-west of England which offer designated courses leading to graduate diplomas in music; how many applications from the region to provide given courses are before his Departmet; and when he will decide on the application of Mabel Fletcher college in Liverpool.

Mr. Brooke: The Royal Northern college of music in Manchester offers two designated courses leading to graduate diplomas in music. Mabel Fletcher technical college is one of two institutions which have applied for the designation of similar courses. These applications have been refused for financial reasons. The Department will shortly be replying to the Mabel Fletcher technical college's letter of 17 January on the subject.

Schools (Governing Bodies)

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to sign new articles of government for enlarged governing bodies of voluntary-aided school in the diocese of Southwark.

Mr. Dunn: New draft instruments—which, rather than articles, are the documents in question—providing for the reconstitution of governing bodies under the Education Act 1980 have been issued in respect of schools in the Roman Catholic diocese of Southwark for the formal consultation required under section 17(5) of the Education Act 1944. Drafts for schools in the Church of England diocese will issue very shortly. The date on which the final documents will be made depends on the response to these consultations.

Open University

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the level of Government grant for the Open University in the calendar year 1986.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend is considering the Open University visiting committee's report. He hopes shortly to inform the university of its firm grant for 1985 and indicated grants for 1986 and 1987.

National Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the future of the National Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education.

Sir Keith Joseph: As I announced on 31 July 1984 at column 184 the national advisory body which advises me on the planning and management of public sector higher education is to be reconstituted with effect from 1 February 1985, at the end of its current interim life.

The body will be renamed the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education, and the terms of reference and membership of the committee and board will be as follows:

COMMITTEE

Chairman

The Hon. Peter Brooke, MP, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science

Members

Coucillor P. D. Merridale, Association of County Councils

Councillor Mrs. J. Farringdon, Association of County Councils

Councillor P. White, Association of County Councils

Councillor Mrs. N. Harrison, Association of Metropolitan Authorities
Councillor J. D. Pearman, Association of Metropolitan Authorities
Councillor B. A. Sams, Association of Metropolitan Authorities
Mr. C. J. E. Ball, Chairman of the Board

Terms of Reference

1. In the light of the resources specified for local authority higher education in England by the Secretary of State after consultation with the local authorities, and of the resources specified by him for the voluntary colleges, to consider, on the basis of recommendations from the Board, the academic provision to be made in each of the institutions within the NAB's remit.

2. To advise the Secretary of State on the appropriate use of his powers with regard to the apportionment of the advanced further education pool, the allocation of resources for capital expenditure for local authority higher education, the allocation of resources to the voluntary colleges, and the approval of advanced courses.

3. To monitor the implementation by local authorities and institutions of dispositions made by the Secretary of State in the light of this advice.

4. In formulating this advice, to contribute to a co-ordinated approach to provision, as necessary in relevant academic fields, between the local authority, voluntary, university and direct grant sectors of higher education; and between the provision in England and that in other countries of the United Kingdom.

5. To undertake or commission such studies or to seek such information as appear necessary for the determination of such advice.

6. The institution within the remit of the NAB are all the local authority maintained or assisted institutions of further education offering courses of advanced further education and the following voluntary colleges:

Newman College
Westhill College
West Sussex Institute*
Homerton College
Christ Church College
College of St. Paul and St. Mary
Chester College
Derbyshire College of Higher Education*
St. Martin's College
Trinity and All Saints' College
Bishop Grosseteste College
Liverpool Institute of Higher Education
Roehampton Institute of Higher Education
St. Mary's College
West London Institute*
De La Salle College
Westminster College
College of St. Mark and St. John
La Sainte Union College of Higher Education
King Alfred's College
College of Ripon and York St. John

* Jointly maintained institutions

Terms of Reference

To receive instructions from and make recommendations to the Committee in pursuit of the fulfilment of the Committee's Terms of Reference. In so doing, the Board will:

(a) establish such ad hoc groups as the Committee judges necessary to assist with aspects of this task;

(b) in formulating recommendations for the voluntary colleges, consult the Voluntary Sector Consultative Council;

(c) establish effective liaison with the university and direct grant sectors of higher education, with appropriate validating, professional and accrediting bodies and, as necessary with representatives of industry, commerce and the professions; and with those concerned with the provision of higher education in the other countries of the United Kingdom;

(d) secure advice from appropriate sources as necessary on the regional and local aspects of higher education in the local authority and voluntary sectors of higher education.

Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the future of the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers.

Sir Keith Joseph: The five-year term for which the committee was established expires this spring. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have valued the contribution to the development of policy on initial and in-service training which the committee has made through a series of important reports, including its recent advice on intakes to initial training between now and 1989. The committee has covered a wide range of issues and we judge that time is now needed for the teacher training system to assimilate the changes initiated by its advice. Accordingly, we have decided not to reconstitute the committee immediately after its final meeting at the end of April. We shall consider convening a new committee in about two years' time if the need for fresh advice is by then established.

PRIME MINISTER

EC Heads of Government

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister on how many occasions, for what purposes, for what periods and at what places the European Economic Community Heads of Government working groups have met since their introduction.

The Prime Minister: The schedule of meetings of the Ad Hoc Committee on Institutions is as follows:

Dates	Place
28 September	Brussels
10-11 October	Brussels
24-25 October	Brussels
7-8 November	Brussels
21-22 November	Brussels
13 December	Brussels
16-17 January	Brussels
30-31 January (proposed)	Brussels
13-14 February (proposed)	Brussels
27-28 February (proposed)	Brussels
13-14 March (proposed)	Brussels

The schedule of meetings of the People's Europe Committee is:

Dates	Place
7 November	Brussels
23 November	Brussels
27-28 November	Brussels
17-18 December	Brussels
11 January	Brussels
21-22 January	Brussels
4-5 February (proposed)	Brussels
18-19 February (proposed)	Brussels

Purpose

The terms of reference of both these Committees were set out in the conclusions of the Fontainebleau European Council, copies of which have been deposited in the Library of the House.

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister what recommendations or proposals for legislation have been made by the Heads of Government working groups of the European Economic Community; and to whom any such proposals or suggestions are made.

The Prime Minister: None. A number of ideas for the future development of the Community were contained in the Committees' interim reports, which are available in the Library of the House. The committees are to submit final reports to the European Council this year. Heads of Government will consider the reports in detail in June.

Mr. David Williamson

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister if she will list the experience and qualifications of Mr. David Williamson and his duties in connection with the Heads of Government working groups of the European Economic Community, together with the amount and source of his remuneration and expenses.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Williamson is a deputy-secretary in the Cabinet Office. I have appointed him to act as United Kingdom representative on the People's Europe Committee. He receives no remuneration over and above his normal salary. Travel costs are paid from EC funds; his other expenses from the Cabinet Office budget.

ENERGY

Domestic Supplies (Disconnections)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Energy what the figures are for each year from 1978 for fuel disconnections.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have asked the chairmen of the Electricity Council and the British Gas Corporation to provide the information direct to the hon. Member.

DEFENCE

Defence Programme (Cost)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the annual cost of the defence programme in terms of (a) expenditure per head of population and (b) expenditure per household.

Mr. Stanley: Based on the latest provision for the defence programme in 1984-85, the information requested is as follows:

(a) expenditure per head of the population	£306
(b) expenditure per household	£860

Falkland Islands

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimate of the total overall costs of the recapture, garrisoning and defending of the Falkland Islands since the Argentine invasion.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) on 29 January at columns 155-56.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Community Radio

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received a report on the trials of community radio; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The BBC is evaluating the experiment in neighbourhood radio in the greater Manchester area. As regards community radio in general, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 23 January at columns 417-18.

Refugees (Naturalisation)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he proposes to take following Recommendation No. R (84) 21 of the Committee of Ministers to member states of the Council of Europe concerning the acquisition by refugees of the nationality of the host country; and in particular whether he will take steps to (a) reduce the required period of residence and (b) reduce the charges arising out of the procedure for naturalisation as recommended.

Mr. Waddington: We have explained to the Council of Europe the procedures governing the acquisition of British citizenship. These include, should it be necessary in a particular case, waiving the normal residence requirements where the Home Secretary has a discretion to do so. Ministers have no power to waive the fees for naturalisation in individual cases, and it would be both impractical, and unfair to other applicants, to give special treatment to all applicants who had been granted refugee status at some point in their past.

Community Service

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to extend community service to hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor It is for area probation services to find suitable work for offenders ordered to perform community service and much valuable work is already done in many types of hospital.

Prison Officers (Residential Accommodation)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current provision for prison officers to acquire the homes they at present rent from his Department.

Mr. Mellor Prison officers occupy quarters rent-free as a condition of service or, subject to permission, may live in private accommodation with the benefit of a housing allowance. A proposed change in conditions of service including provision of discount sales of quarters to occupants was not accepted on a recent ballot of members of the Prison Officers' Association, but surplus quarters may be purchased by occupants at current market value.

Departmental Administration Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what have been the total administration costs of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Brittan: The total cost of administration of the Home Office (including the prison, immigration and police technical support services) expressed in 1983-84 prices in the last five years*, was:

	£ million
1979-80	486·8
1980-81	†539·9
1981-82	584·0
1982-83	‡624·7
1983-84	658·5

* This information is taken from the annual scrutinies of departmental running costs, the outcome of the most recent of which was announced in a written answer on 22 November 1984 at columns 271-24.

† The figure for 1980-81 is an estimate, since actual expenditure for that year was not required in that form for scrutiny purposes.

Foreign Nationals

Mr. Normanton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which forms nationals of other European Community countries are currently given to complete or keep at the point of entry to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: Greek nationals travelling on their national identity cards are issued with form IS 121. All other EC nationals receive form IS 120.

Amusement Arcades

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions he has reached from his review of the gaming law in relation to amusement arcades.

Mr. Brittan: Following the introduction of Lord Campbell of Alloway's Amusement Machines Bill in another place on 1 November 1983, my Department has engaged in consultations with a wide range of interests concerned with amusement arcades and we have reviewed the operation of the gaming laws in relation to these premises. In looking at the case for change I have considered carefully the available evidence on the extent of the problems posed by arcades and the alleged inadequacy of the present law. In particular, I have considered a submission by the amusement arcade action group.

I have concluded that there is no clear evidence of problems which would justify fresh controls over amusement arcades. I therefore have no plans at present to bring forward proposals for legislation augmenting the controls in the Gaming Act 1968.

The 1968 Act already gives local authorities a wide discretion to refuse to grant gaming permits to the occupiers of amusement arcades where they consider this appropriate. Much of the complaint about arcades has been about the location, appearance and noise associated with arcades which make the particular site in question unsuitable. These are planning considerations. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has recently announced at columns 5-6 that his Department is making available advice about the application of planning controls to a number of developments including amusement centres. I hope this will prove helpful. In addition, local authorities may wish to consider whether there are particular local problems which call for other remedies already available such as byelaws under section 75 of the Public Health Act 1961.

It has been alleged that young people need to be protected against the attractions of amusement arcades.

However I have had to weigh this against the fact that many amusement arcades, particularly at seaside resorts are designed with young people in mind and have been in operation for many years without giving rise to undue criticism of this nature. It has also been suggested that the controls should be extended to cover video and other games not at present subject to the Gaming Act 1968. The controls exist, however, because of the problems which are traditionally associated with forms of gambling, where the prospect of cash prizes may encourage people to participate excessively and I am not persuaded that the law should extend in this respect to machines which do not meet this condition.

Before I could accept that there is a need for fresh legislation I would have to be persuaded that hard evidence is to hand of problems which cannot be adequately dealt with under the law at present. I do not judge that the evidence presented to me at present meets this test.

Polling Stations (Ramps)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice is given to electoral registration officers on the availability of grants for the provision of ramps to polling stations; and what publicity is given to the existence of such a scheme.

Mr. Mellor: Acting returning officers were advised in 1981 and again in 1983 that HM Treasury would be prepared to meet half the cost of purchasing a portable ramp for the disabled at a polling station if the local authority responsible for the conduct of local elections at that station was prepared to meet the other half. The Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation was informed of the existence of this scheme in 1981.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Renal Dialysis

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to achieve a target of 40 new patients per annum per million of the population in Northern Ireland who are suffering from end-stage renal failure; if he can give any indication of a speed-up in the process; if he will indicate what his target figure is for 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Specific targets will be set for developing renal services in discussion with Health and Social Services Boards. These discussions are now in progress and I shall be announcing the targets when they have been agreed. Without prejudice to the outcome of those discussions, the Eastern Health and Social Services Board intends in the near future to expand the regional dialysis services to allow for the treatment of 12 additional patients.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he is satisfied that all patients in Northern Ireland needing treatment for end-stage renal failure receive such treatment; if he is satisfied with the referral rate by general practitioners and other consultants to renal consultants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. I fully accept the need for improvement in the level of provision for end-stage renal failure. Following the review of services now taking place, specific targets will be set for the further development of such services. The referral by general practitioners and other consultants is, of course, a matter for clinical judgment.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider setting up a limited number of renal units in Northern Ireland to cater for the problems created by difficult kidney patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. It would not be feasible to set up special renal units to deal with difficult patients.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider the establishment in Northern Ireland of an independent inquiry into the treatment of end-stage renal failure; if he will indicate what policies his Department recommends in circumstances where there is insufficient provision for patients in need; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have already initiated as part of my Department's regional planning responsibilities a comprehensive review of services for kidney patients in Northern Ireland in order to establish the appropriate levels of provision in relation to the various methods of treatment for end-stage renal failure. I am satisfied that a further inquiry would serve no useful purpose. The provision of appropriate treatment to patients within the resources available is a matter for clinical judgment.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Departmental Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what have been the total administration costs of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Renton: The total cost of administration of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, including the Overseas Development Administration, expressed in millions of pounds in 1983-84 prices in the last five years was

	£ million
1979-80	378·6
1980-81	371·8
1981-82	373·1
1983-84	376·4

The underlying cash figures for 1979-80 to 1982-83 are the same as those which produced the table at 1982-83 constant prices, which my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) gave my hon. Friend on 23 January 1984.

European Communities

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provision for expenditure on the Heads of Government working groups is made in the current budget of the European Communities; and if there are any other sources of funding.

Mr. Rifkind:
Ad Hoc Committee on Institutions (Dooge committee)

Conference rooms are provided for this committee in the Palais d'Egmont by the Belgian Government. Travel expenses and conference services (eg typing and interpretation) are paid for by the Council or Commission from within their existing financial provisions. Delegates pay their own additional expenses. The Council, the Commission and the Irish Government each provide the services of one A-Grade officer as secretariat for the committee.

People's Europe Committee

This committee is funded in the same way as the Ad Hoc Committee on Institutions except that there is no secretariat.

Multilateral Disarmament Negotiations

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the multilateral disarmament negotiations in which Her Majesty's Government currently participate.

Mr. Luce: We are playing a leading part in efforts at the Geneva conference on disarmament to negotiate a total ban on chemical weapons. At the Stockholm conference we seek measures to reduce tension in Europe through greater reciprocal openness about military activities. In the mutual and balanced force reductions talks in Vienna, NATO and Warsaw Pact countries are negotiating reductions in conventional forces in central Europe.

Israel (Arab Trade Boycott)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to him by management of United Kingdom-based subsidiaries of American companies whose parent companies are threatened with prosecutions in the United States of America because of the alleged compliance by the United Kingdom subsidiary with the Arab trade boycott of Israel; and what reply he has given.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no such representations.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on how many occasions in each of the years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 officials of his Department have authenticated the signatures of notaries-public on documents which purport to state that goods for export to countries participating in the Arab trade boycott of Israel are not wholly or in part of Israeli manufacture; and why this practice is permitted to continue.

Mr. Luce: The information requested is not available. When the signature and seal of a notary public is authenticated by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, no record is kept of the contents of the document to which the notarial certificate is attached. The practice is a standard legal procedure, which merely confirms the validity of the signature. We reviewed that practice in 1983 and concluded that it would not be right to change our long-standing procedures.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State of the United States of America regarding the fines imposed in September 1984 in the United States of America on two United Kingdom subsidiaries of American firms for complying with the Arab trade boycott of Israel contrary to United States' legislation; and what future steps he proposes to harmonise United Kingdom legislation on this issue with the United States of America.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend has not discussed these fines with the United States Secretary of State, nor do we believe that United Kingdom legislation would be appropriate.

Falkland Islands (Air Service)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in establishing a civil external air service for the Falklands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We look forward to the establishment of commercial air services linking the Falklands and the outside world, after the completion in early 1986 of the new airport at Mount Pleasant.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to fix a South American city for regular onward civil flights to the Falklands.

Mr. Renton: I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport that no proposals have been received for such flights.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if a Government subsidy is to be made available for a civil external air service for the Falklands.

Mr. Renton: There are no plans for such a subsidy.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council on 28 and 29 January.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I made earlier today.

SCOTLAND

Households (Statistics)

Mr. Fairbairn asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many households there are in Scotland; how many people are currently on the electoral register in Scotland; and what is the total amount of revenue from rates provided by (a) commerce, (b) industry and (c) householders.

Mr. Ancram: Estimates of the numbers of households in Scotland are published annually by my Department in "Scottish Housing Statistics"; the 1985 issue will contain the 1984 estimate of 1·84 million. Electoral statistics are published annually by the Registrar General for Scotland; in 1984 there were some 3·957 million people on the electoral register in Scotland. Estimates of revenue from rates are published by the Scottish branch of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in "Rating Review"; in 1984-85 it is estimated that commerce will pay rates of £430 million, industry £180 million and householders £410 million. All the publications mentioned may be found in the Library of the House.

Renal Units

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider setting up in Scotland a limited number of renal units to cater for the problems created by difficult kidney patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: I do not consider that the need for this has been made out.

End-stage Renal Failure

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to achieve a target of 40 new patients per annum per million of the population in Scotland who are suffering from end-stage renal failure; if he can give any indication of a speed-up in the process; if he will indicate what his target figure is for 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Statistics of patients being treated for end-stage renal failure in 1984 are not yet available, but I understand that these are likely to show that about 40 new patients per million of the population are now being treated annually in Scotland. There are now specific targets for the treatment of patients with this condition, but I expect that the number of new patients being treated per million of the population will continue to increase.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider the establishment in Scotland of an independent inquiry into the treatment of end-stage renal failure; if he will indicate what policies his Department recommends in circumstances where there is insufficient provision for patients in need; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: I do not consider that an independent inquiry would serve any useful purpose since we already have sufficient information about the treatment of end-stage renal failure. It is primarily for health boards to decide what provision to make for patients in their particular areas, and to allocate their resources accordingly.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied that all patients in Scotland needing treatment for end-stage renal failure receive such treatment; if he is satisfied with the referral rate by general practitioners and other consultants to renal consultants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The extent to which patients are referred for treatment by their general practitioners depends on the medical assessment of their condition and I am unable to comment on such clinical judgments. Subject to that, all patients who are referred for treatment and who would benefit from this are receiving such treatment.

Forestry Planting Grants

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of areas of land of 10 hectares or more in Ross and Cromarty which have received approval for planting grants under the forestry grants scheme since that scheme began, giving the acreage in each case.

Mr. John MacKay: The information, covering the period from 1 October 1981 to 28 January 1985, is as follows:

Name of Estate	Location	Area approved for planting (hectares)
Auchnadarroch	by Plockton	27
Braes of Ullapool	by Ullapool	34
Corriemoillie	by Garve	777
Coulin	by Loch Carron	62
Edderton	Tain	10
Glencalvie	Tain District	96
Glencarron	by Loch Carron	164
Kildermorie	by Loch Morie	154
Knockbain	Dingwall	13
Langwell	by Strath Oykel	150
Langwell Wood	by Strath Oykel	205
Lochluichart	by Garve	36
Morangie	Alness	8
New Kelso	by Loch Carron	48
New Kelso	by Loch Carron	221
Newmore Wood	Invergordon	24
Rosehaugh	Black Isle	55
Swordale	Dingwall	31

To date, grants have been paid in respect of a total of 108 hectares of planting on these properties.

Tourism (Development)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to increase the funds available for financial assistance to tourist development under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969.

Mr. John MacKay: As a result of increased demand for assistance under section 4, additional funds were made available in 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Tourist Policy

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set up a standing committee for the arts, heritage and tourism to ensure that proper consideration is given to co-ordination of tourist policy in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Road Signs (Tourism)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to complete consideration of the scheme to provide road signs for tourist purposes.

Mr. Ancram: Following discussions with the Scottish Tourist Board, the introduction of a number of new road signs for tourist facilities, and the criteria for their provision, were announced in 1983.

Scottish Development Agency (Tourist Projects)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many of the Scottish Development Agency's service industries division's projects being considered for financial support are related to tourism.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Tourism (Expenditure)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the capital and current expenditure of each local authority in Scotland on tourism and tourist-related projects for the latest year for which figures are available in cash and per capita terms.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Bypass Signs (Borders Region)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a timetable showing when he expects to complete the erection of strung-bow trunk route bypass signs of towns and villages in the Borders region.

Mr. Ancram: It is proposed to erect strung-bow signs in the spring of this year on the A1 for the community of Ayton. Other strung-bow signs will be erected where appropriate when new bypasses are constructed.

Scottish Tourist Board

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report Her Majesty's Government's projections of the sums to be made available to enable the Scottish Tourist Board to exercise the powers of overseas promotion in the Tourism (Overseas Promotion) (Scotland) Act from 1984-85 until 1987-88.

Mr. John MacKay: As was announced by my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State during the Second Reading speech on the Tourism (Overseas Promotion) (Scotland) Bill, the Government are making available an additional annual allocation of £200,000, from 1984-85 to enable the Scottish Tourist Board to undertake an overseas programme.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will approve a three-year rolling programme for administration of section 4 Scottish Tourist Board grants.

Mr. John MacKay: No. The board, like other public bodies, has to conform to the rules of Government accounting.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report Her Majesty's Government's projections of the sums to be made available to the Scottish Tourist Board for the years until 1987-88 to provide it with funds to pay section 4 grants under the Development of Tourism Act 1969.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend has not yet determined and sought Parliament's approval for allocations at this level of disaggregation.

Tourist Grant Assistance

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will seek to introduce a system which would, in exceptional circumstances, allow for the payment of section 4 tourist grant assistance under the Development of Tourism Act 1969 to be agreed by the Scottish Tourist Board in one financial year but paid in the following year.

Mr. John MacKay: No. In accordance with procedures laid down in Government accounting there can be no postponement of payment sought by a grantee to a subsequent financial year. In cases where a grant is approved in one financial year but the grantee seeks payment in any subsequent year, then, in accord with Government accounting, the payment must be honoured within the financial year in which the payment demand is made by the grantee.

Tourist-related Projects

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what tourist-related projects are currently planned in Scotland by the Forestry Commission, the British Waterways Board, the National Heritage memorial fund, the Scottish Sports Council and the Scottish Arts Council.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Local Authority Finance (Tourism)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report those district authorities in Scotland which have to date refused or delayed to commit their share of local authority finance to each of the area tourist boards for the forthcoming financial year.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Tourist Accommodation

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he propose to take to assist the Scottish Tourist Board to finance the additional work to be carried out in the classification and grading of tourist accommodation in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The necessary steps have already been taken. Following a re-examination of its spending priorities, the Scottish Tourist Board has decided to finance the additional work from within its existing resources.

West of Scotland Science Park

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement regarding the action of the Scottish Development Agency property division taking over the West of Scotland science park, Maryhill; and what consultation with Glasgow and Strathclyde universities took place beforehand.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 117]: The SDA has been responsible for funding and managing the development of the West of Scotland science park since the park's inception. Following experience in running the park during its first two years of operation, and reorganisation of property activities within the agency, the agency has modified its internal arrangements for managing the science park. Representatives of the Universities of Glasgow and Strathclyde were informed of these changes in September 1984 and, I understand, have indicated their support for the new arrangements.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EC (Trade Barriers)

9. Mr. Peter Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he is having with the new Commissioners on the breaking down of barriers to trade within the Community.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend and I expect to meet members of the new Commission shortly. The removal of barriers to intra-Community trade in goods and services will be top of the agenda. Creating a genuine internal market is a high priority for the Government and one which the new Commission shares.

Manufactured Goods

13. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the United Kingdom's trade performance in manufactured goods for 1984.

Mr. Tebbit: I am principally concerned with the United Kingdom's overall trade performance, which was in slight surplus in 1984. In the manufactured goods sector, exports increased in volume by around 10 per cent. in 1984, roughly in line with world trade.

Small Firms Service

15. Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to expand the small firm service.

Mr. Trippier: I have no plans for further expansion at present. The service has expanded substantially in recent years, from 58 staff in 1981 to 94 last year. Over the same period we have more than doubled the number of counsellors from 127 to 261.

25. Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many business counsellors are under contract to the small firms service.

Mr. Trippier: At 31 December 1984 there was 261 business counsellors under contract to the Department of Trade and Industry, a further 49 with the Scottish Development Agency and 44 with the Welsh Development Agency.

Japan (Telecommunications)

20. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect of the privatisation of telecommunications in Japan on the extent of access to the Japanese market for British manufacturers.

Mr. Butcher: The liberalisation of telecommunications in Japan should provide opportunities to British companies which are capable of competing in world markets, and we are pursuing vigorously the issue of reciprocal trading in telecommunications products between Britain and Japan.

Brazil

21. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total value of all exports to Brazil during the last financial year.

Mr. Butcher: United Kingdom exports to Brazil for the period April 1983 to March 1984 were worth £168·5 million.

Small Firms

22. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the help and advice provided by his Department on technological matters to small firms.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. The Department of Trade and Industry provides small firms with help and advice on a wide range of technological matters through the small firms technical enquiry service (SFTES). This service provides up to five man-days of advice and consultancy. The first day is free; firms pay 25 per cent. of the cost of the remaining four days.

Small firms can receive additional advice on micro-electronics applications, advanced manufacturing technology and biotechnology through services specialising in these topics. On these subjects the first two-man days of assistance are free. Thereafter the firm contributes 25 per cent. of the cost subject to an overall maximum cost to DTI of £2,500, including the cost of the two free days.

27. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure co-operation between the small firms service and other sources of advice for small firms.

Mr. Trippier: The small firms service actively co-operates with other organisations providing advice to small firms. There is joint publicity with some enterprise agencies and COSIRA. Extensive use is made by other support organisations of the small firms service publications. Some counselling now takes place from enterprise agency premises. I am actively encouraging such co-operation.

29. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small firms have been established in the last three years.

Mr. Trippier: There were just under 490,000 business start-ups in the three-year period 1981 to 1983. Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

31. Mr. Carttiss asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the conclusions of the interdepartmental scrutiny of the administrative and legislative burdens placed on small firms.

Mr. Trippier: I expect to receive the scrutiny team's conclusions next month.

55. Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is content with the amount of investment in small firms as a result of the business expansion scheme.

Mr. Trippier: I am very pleased with the figures reported so far. During 1983-84 more than 400 small companies raised over £75 million from 10,000 investors. At least £41 million of this went to very young or start-up companies.

Of course, I would like to see still more small companies and individual investors taking advantage of the scheme.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

23. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received on the Silbertson report on the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Channon: Since I gave an answer to questions from my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) on 16 January, further representations have been received recently on both the future of the multi-fibre arrangement and on the Silberston report from companies in the textile and clothing industry, representatives of trade unions in that industry, and from one retailer. I have also had consultative meetings with interested parties about the multi-fibre arrangement which have taken into account the findings of the Silberston report.

30. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the latest position regarding the negotiation of a further multi-fibre arrangement; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The European Community will need to agree its general policy approach before July of this year, when the GATT textiles committee has to consider whether the multi-fibre arrangement should be extended, modified or discontinued. Further negotiations will then ensue, before the MFA expires in July 1986.

Before deciding the United Kingdom approach to the negotiations, I am consulting interested parties.

Local Enterprise Agencies

24. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has seconded any civil servants to local enterprise agencies.

Mr. Trippier: My Department has seconded four civil servants to local enterprise agencies.

Basildon New Town

26. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the number of businesses which have announced their intentions of moving to Basildon new town in the last two months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My information is that one major American company which is planning to build a toy superstore in the town employing 200 people, has announced its intention recently to set up in Basildon.

Electricity (Resale)

28. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the report by the Office of Fair Trading on the resale of electricity by landlords.

Mr. Fletcher: As my hon. Friend is aware, the Office of Fair Trading is currently considering the comments which it received on the consultative document it issued last year. I look forward to seeing a copy of the office's final report and recommendations which I understand will be available in the next few months.

Business Improvement Service

32. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many inquiries have been received by his Department about the recently launched business improvement service.

Mr. Trippier: Inquiries about business improvement services are not recorded; but there has been a good response from small firms and providers of services in the eligible areas, and, by 11 January, 185 firm applications had been received.

37. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is taking to promote the business improvement service.

Mr. Trippier: The Department of Trade and Industry is arranging a programme of regional seminars aimed at small business men and their professional advisers, such as accountants and solicitors, and others who might benefit. I expect also to see continuing interest by local press and radio.

Buses (Legislation)

33. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has had on the effects on the Leyland Bus Co. of the proposed buses Bill.

Mr. Butcher: I have received a letter from my hon. Friend enclosing a paper produced by the trade unions at Leyland Bus. BL's 1985 corporate plan, which is now being considered, naturally takes into account the effects of prospective changes in legislation on all BL's businesses.

Manufacturing Industry (Investment)

34. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how the current level of investment in manufacturing industry compares with the figure for 1979.

Mr. Channon: The latest available estimate of investment in manufacturing in 1984 is £6·1 billion at 1980 prices, including leased assets, compared with £8·2 billion in 1979.

Latin America (Exports)

35. Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made as to whether exports to Latin America are being restricted by lack of export credit guarantees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I have no doubt that export credit guarantees are an important factor in fostering our trade with Latin America. Therefore, I keep all markets under constant review and, as a result, ECGD has recently restored medium term cover for Brazil and for the Mexican private sector.

British Aersopace

36. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that control of British Aerospace will not pass into foreign hands when Her Majesty's Government dispose of their shares.

Mr. Tebbit: The articles of association of British Aerospace plc provide that the aggregate number of foreign-held shares in the company must not exceed 15 per cent. of the shares ordinarily eligible to be voted on a poll at general meetings of the company, and that the directors must be British citizens. The Government will retain a special share which will ensure that these provisions cannot be amended without the Government's consent.

English Industrial Estates (Small Units)

38. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small units English Industrial Estates has completed in the last three years.

Mr. Trippier: The English Industrial Estates Corporation completed 1,741 small units, of 232 square metres or less, in the last three full financial years. This was broken down as follows: 223 in 1981-82; 870 in 1982-83 and 658 in 1983-84. In the current financial year a further 303 units had been completed by November 1984.

Citizens Band Radio

39. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many prosecutions have been brought against persons who have been the subject of citizens band radio interference investigations over the last 12 months.

Mr. Butcher: During the 12 months from 1 October 1983 to 30 September 1984, 1,260 people were prosecuted under the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949 for the unlicensed use of citizens band radio equipment or for non-compliance with licence conditions. The great majority of these cases arose out of investigations by the radio investigation service of interference experienced by authorised radio users.

Yorkshire (Industrial Costs)

40. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on changes in the level of industrial costs in Yorkshire over the last 12 months.

Mr. Trippier: Official data on changes in the level of industrial costs in Yorkshire over the last 12 months are not available.

Regional Assistance

41. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the implications of his revision of regional assistance in the United Kingdom for the availability of European regional development funds.

Mr. Trippier: The increase in regional area coverage and the changes to the regional development grant scheme will improve the United Kingdom's ability to take advantage of assistance from the European regional development fund.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

42. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to take further decisions on the future arrangements of the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend will take further decisions as soon as possible after he has received the report of the review which I announced on 21 November last.

52. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is now in a position to announce those countries to whom extra Export Credits Guarantee Department cover will be made available.

Mr. Channon: Brazil and Mexico have already been confirmed as candidates under the new scheme which I announced to the House on 19 December 1984. Decisions on the resumption of cover for other debtor countries will be released by ECGD from time to time as appropriate.

Small Firms Enterprise Week

43. Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give details of the programme for the proposed small firms enterprise week in 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Local enterprise week 1985 will be held from 15 to 25 May. I have written to a wide range of organisations asking them to participate and have received a good response. A special theme for the week will be the importance of education and training for the development of small firms. It is too early to give a full programme of events during the week, but I expect there to be a large number of local activities to promote the help available to small firms. My Department will be co-ordinating these events regionally and will work with national and local media to ensure publicity for activities during the week.

Cars (Exports to Spain)

44. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received regarding the difficulties of exporting British manufactured cars to Spain.

Mr. Channon: During the past 12 months I have received a number of letters from Members Parliament, trade associations and manufacturers about exporting cars to Spain. I have also met representatives of the United Kingdom car industry on several occasions as part of a regular exchange of views on this subject. Agreement was reached last month between the Community and Spain on improved access to the Spanish car market after she joins the Community. The details were contained in a written answer on 19 December to my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Speed).

Manufacturing Industry Output

45. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the most recent figure for output in manufacturing industry; and how this compares with the figure for the same month in 1979.

Mr. Trippier: For the three months to November 1984 the index of production for manufacturing industry is 100, based on 1980 equal to 100. This is 7 per cent. lower than the index of production for manufacturing industry in the three months to November 1979.

Assisted Area Status

46. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will seek to vary the provisions relating to assisted area status to permit assistance to be given to areas of high unemployment that currently do not qualify.

Mr. Trippier: As the closest available approximations to self-contained labour markets covering the whole country travel-to-work areas are both the most sensible basis for a policy aimed at encouraging additional employment opportunities in areas where they are most needed and the fairest way of making nationwide comparisons of areas' relative needs for such additional jobs.

Machine Tool Industry

47. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the prospects for 1985 of the performance of the British machine tool industry.

Mr. Butcher: Machine tool sales showed encouraging signs of recovery in 1984, and the industry should benefit from increasing demand in both home and export markets this year.

Small Firms (Management Training)

48. Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to promote the development of management training in small firms.

Mr. Trippier: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on Wednesday 19 December 1984 at column 241.

"Brazil—New Opportunities" (Exhibition)

49. Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has been invited to attend the conference, "Brazil—New Opportunities," on 12 February.

Mr. Channon: No.

European Regional Development Fund Aid

50. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of European regional development fund aid committed to Britain will be devoted to Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland and England, respectively.

Mr. Trippier: In future, the share of ERDF receipts devoted to the individual countries of the United Kingdom will depend on their ability to generate eligible projects which command suitable priority in Community terms, and cannot therefore be predicted.

Oldham Batteries

51. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions his Department has had with Oldham Batteries at Denton about assistance with development of new plant and equipment.

Mr. Butcher: To protect commercial confidentiality, the practice in my Department is not to disclose its discussions with companies.

Nuclear Electro-Magnetic Pulse

53. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what effect a one megaton nuclear burst at a height of 300 miles overhead would have on premises and equipment in his charge.

Mr. Trippier: Unprotected electronic and electrical equipment would be susceptible to damage from nuclear electro-magnetic pulse. Other effects can be discounted.

54. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electro-magnetic pulse.

Mr. Trippier: None.

British Telecom

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing for 29 November 1984 the number of British Telecom shareholders, excluding the Government, holding the following amounts of shares: 200 or fewer, 201 to 300, 301 to 399, 400 to 799, 800 to 1,199, 1,200 to 1,599, 1,600 to 99,999, 100,000 to 999,999 and one million or more, or a similar readily available distribution.

Mr. Butcher: The allocation of British Telecom shares under the United Kingdom offer for sale was as follows:

Number of shares allocated	Number of shareholders
0 to 200	525,698
400	512,063
500	335,945
600	117,501
800	625,971
1,200	3,461
1,600	12,706
Over 1,600	8,302

These figures include allocations made to employees in their own names but do not cover shares acquired by employees under the Government's free and matching share offer, which are currently held in trust. The allottees for over 1,600 shares include 2,127 institutional and other investors who applied for shares as priority applicants in the United Kingdom offer.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether the names and addresses of British Telecom shareholders are held on computer;

(2) if he will estimate the cost of providing the information sought by the hon. Member for Yeovil on British Telecom shareholders in his question answered on 17 January, Official Report, column 199; and if he will provide the basis of this cost estimate.

Mr. Butcher: The details of the original BT share allottees are in the course of being loaded on to computer by the six receiving bankers to the issue. An analysis of their addresses now could only be carried out manually from share application forms, which would clearly involve disproportionate effort and cost, given the numbers involved.

The details will be loaded and transferred on to computers held by two banks by late spring, and the data will then be updated to form a register. I am advised that a computer analysis at that time to obtain the information sought would be likely to require a transfer of computer tapes between the banks, and a number of computer runs through the register. The cost of doing this on current shareholder numbers is estimated at well in excess of £25,000.

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has had any discussions with British Shipbuilders about retaining its headquarters at Benton house, Newcastle, in the context of the Government's policy of privatising the warship yards and Swan Hunters.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend has had no such discussions. However, I understand that British Shipbuilders has every intention of retaining its headquarters at Benton house for the foreseeable future.

Shipbuilding Industry (Redundancies)

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what statistics he has showing the numbers of those volunteering for redundancy from the shipbuilding industry in the past two years by age group.

Mr. Butcher: Statistics are not available in the form requested. However, the following table gives details, by age group, of British Shipbuilders employees who have been made redundant and have received benefit under the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme in the two years ending December 1984:

Age Group	Numbers
Under 40	5,448
40 to 44	1,232
45 to 49	1,371
50 to 55	1,632
55 to 59	2,339
60 to 64	2,821
Total	14,843

Space Agency

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the creation of an independent space agency for Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Radio Stations

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many licences have been granted for cellular radio base stations under the Telecommunications Act 1984; and how many of these are in the vicinity of the M25 motorway.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

British Aerospace Space Freighter

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he will make at the European Space Agency Council meeting on 30 January concerning European acceptance of the British Aerospace space freighter.

Mr. Butcher: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) on 21 January at column 280.

British Leyland

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made by British Leyland over the sale of its Bathgate plant.

Mr. Butcher: I understand from BL that it has co-operated fully in providing potential purchasers of the Bathgate plant, in particular Marshalls Tractors and JCB, with the information they need in order to come to a decision. It is as yet too early to say whether this will lead to any sale.

Electricity Boards (Revenue Collection)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the revenue collection system of the East Midlands, South-Eastern, North-Eastern and South Western area electricity boards will be published.

Mr. Fletcher: The report is published today.

The commission was asked to investigate the efficiency and costs of the boards' revenue collection systems; the service given to consumers — including in relation to revenue collection and tariffs — and the treatment of revenue collection costs in the boards' reports and accounts.

The commission finds much to commend but makes a number of suggestions for improving cost control. The commission notes that the boards expect the costs of revenue collection to be reduced in real terms during the next few years. It recommends that each board should set a quantified cost objective for revenue collection, against which performance can be measured, and that the medium term objective for each board should be the achievement of continuing cost reduction in real terms. It also recommends that there should be more detailed budgetary control by the boards themselves.

The commission draws attention to the many differences between the boards' arrangements and procedures for revenue collection and recommends a drive to identify the implement best or improved practices throughout the industry. The commission also considers that there should be greater consistency between the boards with regard to measures of performance.

The commission considers that the boards should publish more information about their revenue collection costs and about standing charges.

The commission records the boards' view that advising consumers and answering queries are an integral part of their functions and are consistent with the increasing emphasis which they place on customer care. The report notes the difficulties of quantifying customer satisfaction but expresses the hope that continuing co-operation between the boards and the consultative councils will lead to great consistency in the recording of customer complaints, which could then give a somewhat better indication of customer satisfaction. The commission broadly endorses the boards' policies of developing payment schemes, partly to help customers who have difficulty in paying their electricity bills. The commission also recommends that the boards should follow the Electricity Council's guide on investment appraisal and should conduct their appraisals in a uniform way.

Finally, the commission concludes that none of the four boards is pursuing a course of conduct which operates against the public interest. The boards will be producing their initial responses to the report in about three to four months and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy will make a statement on these at that time.

I should like to take this opportunity to thank the commission for a worthwhile and useful report on a subject which is of direct interest to all electricity consumers.

Manufactured Goods (Balance of Trade)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the latest figure for the United Kingdom's balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Channon: Trade in manufactured goods was in deficit by £0·7 billion in the fourth quarter of 1984.

Shipbuilding (Privatisation)

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the current level of capacity utilisation in those United Kingdom shipyards scheduled for privatisation.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 28 January 1985, c.46]: It is clear that some shipyards are more fully occupied than others. However, capacity depends on a number of factors, including present work force, availability of further labour and the availability of physical assets. There is, therefore, no precise measure and accordingly no reliable statistics.

United Medical Enterprises

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has monitored the subsequent disposal of assets of United Medical Enterprises, formerly a subsidiary of the National Enterprise Board; what is his practice in relation to the monitoring of such sales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 28 January 1985, c.47]: No. United MedicaL Enterprises is now a subsidiary of the London and Northern Group, and is treated by the Government on the same basis as any other private sector company.

Amateur Radio Licence

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to introduce a novice amateur radio licence.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 29 January 1985, c.74]: We have no plans to introduce a novice amateur radio licence at present.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has had from the Radio Society of Great Britain in relation to the introduction of a novice amateur radio licence.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 29 January 1985, c.74]: The Radio Society of Great Britain, which represents the interests of United Kingdom radio amateurs, has put forward proposals for a provisional or novice licence in the past, but it has not done so in recent times because, I understand, doubts have been expressed as to whether a novice facility is in the best interests of amateur radio. We require radio amateurs to achieve a minimum standard of proficiency and there are fears that introducing a lower standard for novices would cause interference to other services. Officials in the Department's radio regulatory division (RRD) are, however, in discussion with the society about an alternative facility; a formal proposal has just been put forward and is receiving consideration.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the amateur radio licence issuing department has been fully computerised.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 29 January 1985, c.74]: The amateur radio licensing process became fully computerised on 1 October 1984. At this early stage, refinements to the system are continuing.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC Budget

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the purpose of a memorandum entry on the expenditure side of the draft EEC budget for 1985; and if it is intended that the amount of 1,315 million European currency units for agricultural expenditure mentioned in his answer on 5 December 1984 will be spent in 1985.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The purpose was to reaffirm the commitment given by the Council of Ministers in October that the inescapable agricultural overrun in 1985 would be provided for when there was a legal basis for a budget which included it.

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the EEC Council of Finance Ministers, in setting the reference framework for budget expenditure, will have recommendations on this topic from other bodies in the EEC before making a decision.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission has agreed to provide the necessary information to enable the Council to fix the reference framework. The Council has undertaken to invite a delegation from the European Parliament to meet it before decisions on the reference framework are taken.

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which EEC body will be responsible for preparing background information and recommendations for the Council of Finance Ministers before it sets the reference framework for the EEC budget.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission is the relevant Community body.

Tax Credit Scheme

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the cost of introducing a 1972 style tax credit scheme sufficient to enable family income supplement to be eliminated and to reduce pensioner dependence on supplementary benefit by 750,000; and if he will tabulate the statistical assumptions on which this estimate is based.

Mr. Moore: The net cost of such a scheme would be in the region of £8 billion in a full year at 1984-85 levels of personal allowances and post-November 1984 benefit rates.

The levels of credit assumed in the calculations are £19 per week for a married couple with additions, on top of child benefit of £17·20 per week for the first, and £3·80 per week for each subsequent child.

The method of calculation adopted is broadly that set out on pages 302 to 305 of the minutes of evidence given before the Treasury and Civil Service Sub-Committee on the structure of personal income taxation and income support (20-I).

EC (Agricultural Prices)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if EEC Commission proposals for agricultural prices in the light of the financial guidelines will need approval from the Council of Finance Ministers before submission to the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission has undertaken to draw up its proposals on agricultural prices in the light of the financial guideline. The approval of Finance Ministers is needed only if the Agriculture Council wishes to take decisions which would exceed the cost of the Commission's proposals.

On-course Betting Duty

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the cost to the Revenue of abolishing, halving and reducing by 1 per cent., respectively, on-course betting duty.

Mr. Hayhoe: A little under £20 million, £10 million and £5 million, respectively.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the approximate cost per million pounds raised in on-course betting duty of collecting that duty.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that it is not possible to isolate the costs of collecting this duty from those of administering the betting and gaming duties as a whole.

EC (Agricultural Expenditure)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what mechanisms exist to fund the amount overspent if EEC agricultural expenditure in any year exceeds the maximum limit set.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Any unavoidable additional agricultural expenditure would be funded through a supplementary and amending budget.

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what mechanisms exist under the EEC financial guideline for agricultural expenditure in excess of the maximum specified in any year to be recouped by way of reducing agricultural prices in the following year below the level at which they would otherwise have been fixed.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Article 5 of the budgetary discipline agreement states that in clawing back additional agricultural expenditure the Council shall concentrate its activity primarily on the production sectors responsible for the failure to adhere to the guideline. Price reductions would be one means of securing the necessary savings.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will now publish the latest figures available for a married man with two children earning average male annual earnings, showing the length of time, after taking into account income tax liability and national insurance contribution, necessary to pay for each of the following items: 1 lb beef sirloin, 1 lb fresh cod fillets, an 800g sliced loaf, one pint of fresh milk, 1 lb pork, 1 lb back bacon, 1 lb sugar, 1 lb butter, one dozen eggs and 14 lbs potatoes; and if he will provide comparable figures for 1970, 1980 and 1983.

Mr. Peter Rees: The information is in the table. The calculations, presented in minutes, are based on average male—over 21—weekly earnings in all occupations and all industries and services, excluding those whose pay was affected by absence, in April of each year—taken from The New Earnings Survey. For the tax computations, it has been assumed that the two children are under the age of 11. The man is taken to be not-contracted-out for national insurance contributions purposes while the income tax figure assumes no allowances other than personal allowance and child tax allowances. Account has also been taken of family allowance and, in later years, child benefit in order to permit valid comparisons. The figures for average hours worked are also drawn from The New Earnings Survey results. The price data come from information collected for the RPI.

Customs and Excise (Confiscated Goods)

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the estimated value of goods confiscated by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in each of the last five years; what are the main categories of confiscated goods; and what is done with the goods once they have been confiscated.

Mr. Hayhoe: Information about goods seized over the last five years is contained in the relevant annual reports of the commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library. These show the categories of goods concerned and, where available, the value of the items seized.

Confiscated goods are, wherever possible, either sold or, in certain circumstances, restored to their previous owners on payment of restoration sums. Goods which cannot be sold or restored, such as drugs and obscene or indecent material, are destroyed.

Disabled Persons (Polling Stations)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what grants are available for the provision of ramps to polling stations to assist voters confined to wheelchairs; how much has been spent for this purpose in each of the last 10 years; and for each year how many applications for grants have been (a) received and (b) granted.

Mr. Lawson: No specific financial allocation is made to cover grants for the provision of ramps at polling stations as an aid to disabled voters. However, all acting returning officers have been formally advised by the Home Office that the Treasury is prepared to meet half of the cost of purchasing portable ramps for disabled voters at polling stations provided that the local authorities responsible for the conduct of local elections at those stations are content to meet the other half.

It is not possible, except at disproportionate cost, to produce figures for each of the last 10 years of expenditure on ramps or of the numbers of applications recieved and granted by the Treasury from acting returning officers for contributions towards such expenditure.

Nationalised Industries (External Financing Limits)

Mr. Rowlands asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will list the contribution to be made by each individual nationalised industry towards the reduction in the external financing limits for nationalised industries to minus £110 million in 1987-88 as forecast in table 5.1 of Cmnd. 9428-11.

Mr. Peter Rees: No. It has never been the practice to publish external financing limits for individual industries beyond the year ahead. Later years figures for individual industries are subject to particular uncertainties arising from possible fluctuations in trading conditions and from the nature of external finance, being the residual between large offsetting flows of revenue and costs. The publication of such figures could well be misleading.

Mr. Rowlands asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assumptions have been made about the percentage rise in gas and electricity prices in arriving at the reduction in external financing limits for nationalised industries in 1987-88 of minus £110 million in table 5.1 of Cmnd. 9428-11.

Mr. Peter Rees: Decisions on tariffs are a matter for the industries concerned. However, the external financing figures published in table 5.1 of Cmnd. 9428-11 are consistent over the period of the public expenditure plans with price increases for gas broadly in line with the rate of inflation and for electricity slightly below the rate of inflation.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the total cost to the Exchequer of the mining strike.

Mr. Peter Rees: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 24 January at column 501.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Churchill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what have been the changes in public expenditure in each year since 1978-79 to date; and what is his forecast for those years for which figures are available expressed both in constant prices and as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 67]: The information requested is as follows:

	Percentage increase in public expenditure		Public expenditure as a percentage of GDP	Planning total in real terms
	Cash terms	Real terms
1978-79	+15·8	+4·7	—	—

Pay and Employment (Review)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish a review of the evidence relating to the link between pay and employment.

Mr. Lawson: A review by Treasury officials is being published today, and I am placing a copy in the House Library.

Sterling (Exchange Rate)

Sir David Price asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of deteriorating position of the pound sterling against the United States dollar, he intends to initiate any further action.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I have nothing to add to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement to the House on 14 and 29 January and his statement to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on 28 January.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Newcastle Computer Dispute

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action will be taken to recover amounts of benefit overpaid during the strike by computer staff at his Department's Newcastle upon Tyne office.

Mr. Newton: Beneficiaries will be invited to repay any excess amount, but in general we will not press for repayment of overpayments that arose because the Newcastle dispute which the claimant could not reasonably have been expected to prevent or realise, or which had not been accompanied by some clear understanding about subsequent adjustment.

Deaf Persons (Assistance)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will itemise the specific measures which have been taken over the past five years to help deaf people cope with their disability and minimise the handicap arising therefrom.

Mr. Newton: A wide selection of measures has been undertaken, including significant improvements in the range and effectiveness of hearing aids, provision of central funding to help set up the new profession of hearing therapists, the development and evaluation of the Linco Bennett auditory response cradle and installation of inductive couplers in all public and motorway emergency telephone boxes. Also financial support has been given to several voluntary organisations in the deaf field, including considerable help towards the sympathetic hearing scheme, and for various technological projects helping hearing impaired people.

Flenac

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why Flenac is not available for the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis; and what representations have been received since it was withdrawn.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In a review of the safety of non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs, the Committee on Safety of Medicines took account of about 900 reports of adverse reactions, including seven deaths, which were associated with the use of Flenac, and of other evidence on its potential risks and its benefits. The committee advised that there were no overriding clinical benefits that outweighed the risks and that, on grounds of safety, the product licence for the marketing of Flenac in the United Kingdom should not be renewed. The company appealed to the Medicines Commission which upheld the committee's advice, which we accepted. The company then decided to discontinue the sale of Flenac in the United Kingdom and withdrew it from pharmacies on 31 July 1984.

We have received seven letters concerning Flenac since it was withdrawn from the market.

Leukaemia

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about the incidence of leukaemia in East Dorset during the last three years; how the figures compare with the national average for the incidence of leukaemia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is shown in the tables. Great care should be taken in trying to draw any worthwhile conclusions from these figures.

The East Dorset data are based on relatively few cancer registrations; the age structure of the population also has to be considered. Both these factors can lead to differences between the local and national figures. After adjustment for the age structure, the standardised registration ratios for leukaemia in East Dorset are 136 for males and 117 for females, compared with 100 for each sex in England and Wales as a whole. The difference for males—between 136 and 100 — is larger than would normally be expected to arise from chance variations due to the small numbers of cases in East Dorset.

Examination of the age specific rates show that eight of the nine age groups for males and five of the nine age groups for females show higher rates in East Dorset than the corresponding rates for England and Wales as a whole. The main differences for males occur in the age groups 55 to 74. It is not possible to determine whether enhanced recognition and registration of leukaemia in East Dorset, or different diagnostic terms, account for any of the excess.

Cardio-pulmonary Resuscitation (Training)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the training of hospital medical and nursing staff in basic cardio-pulmonary resuscitation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Cardio-pulmonary resuscitation —CPR— is included in general professional training required by the medical royal colleges and faculties and the English National Board for Nurses, Midwives, and Health Visitors.

I am aware of reports that one health authority revised its training in practical techniques in CPR after an article reviewing the performance of 50 of its junior doctors. It is for health authorities with professional advice to provide such training to meet local needs of their staff.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he intends to give to dispensing general practitioners in the period prior to the proposed implementation of a limited list on 1 April 1985 over their stocks of branded products.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 10 January 1985, at column 539, which applies equally to dispensing doctors.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations on his limited list proposals have been carried out with the psychiatric profession.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The medical profession as a whole was consulted through the British Medical Association. In addition, the Royal College of Psychiatrists has written to me and individual psychiatrists have responded to our Chief Medical Officer's invitation to send comments on the medicines which should remain available on the National Health Service. A consultant psychiatrist, Professor Malcolm Lader, who is professor of clinical psychopharmacology at the Institute of Psychiatry of the University of London is assisting our Chief Medical Officer in his appraisal of the professional and medical advice we have received on our provisional list.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will make a statement on his recent meeting with the British Medical Association to discuss the proposed limited list of prescribable drugs;

(2) what proposals he has received from the British Medical Association advocating a recommended list of cheaper drugs, to be drawn up along the lines of hospital formularies, rather than his limited list proposals; and what response he has made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My recent meeting with the British Medical Association clearly demonstrated that its representatives shared the Government's aim of encouraging economic prescribing. The association has not, however, submitted any specific proposals of the sort mentioned by my hon. Friend at any of the meetings I have had with it or its general medical services committee over the last three years.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he is giving to specific problems for rural dispensing doctors by his proposals for a limited list of drugs; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my replies to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) on 5 December 1984 at column 220 and on 9 January 1985 at column 496.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision he intends to make under his limited list proposals to ensure that patients terminally ill with cancer have a wider access to pain-killing drugs than aspirin or morphine; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As I have previously made clear, an adequate range of analgesics will remain available on NHS prescription.

"Don't Smoke" Day

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much public money will be spent on the funding of the national "Don't Smoke" day on 20 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Health Education Council and the Scottish Health Education Group, which are Government funded, are contributing £51,500, about half the total cost, of this year's national no-smoking day. The balance is provided by the other sponsoring organisations and a number of companies. On the evidence of past years, the event is successful in encouraging smokers to give up.

End-Stage Renal Failure

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to achieve his target of 40 new patients per annum per million of the population who are suffering from end-stage renal failure; if he can give any indication of a speed-up in the process; if he will indicate what his target figure is for 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on 20 December at columns 310-311. No target figure has been set for 1990.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider the establishment of an independent inquiry into the treatment of end-stage renal failure; if he will indicate what policies his Department recommends in circumstances where there is insufficient provision for patients in need; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: There is already a great deal of information available about the treatment of end-stage renal failure and we do not consider that an independent inquiry would significantly add to present knowledge.

Whether or not an individual patient is accepted for treatment is a matter for the clinical judgment of the doctors involved.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that all patients needing treatment for end-stage renal failure receive such treatment; if he is satisfied with the referral rate by general practitioners and other consultants to renal consultants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: There is a need for a higher level of services for treatment of end-stage renal failure which is why their development has been identified as a priority, and targets set against which expansion can be monitored.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider setting up a limited number of renal units to cater for the problems created by difficult kidney patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: It is for health authorities to decide, in the light of local clinical advice, whether any special treatment facilities are required for particular categories of kidney patients.

Health Authority Statistics

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will list information and statistics known to be collected by regional health authorities but not collated centrally by his Department.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect information about information we do not collect.

Information (Members' Requests)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report requests for information on matters within his responsibility since June 1983 from hon. Members that he has been unable to respond to.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

DHSS Statistics

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what statistics his Department has ceased to collect since June 1983.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Hospital Inpatients (Cost)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current weekly cost of a National Health Service hospital inpatient in the last three years for which figures are available; and if he will estimate the cost in the current year.

Mr. Patten: The table shows the weekly cost of an inpatient in various types of National Health Service hospital:

Type of hospital	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Acute over 300 beds	555·38	603·05	626·15
Acute 101-300 beds	500·92	553·07	580·02
Acute 51-100 beds	433·65	466·20	496·37
Acute 1-50 beds	319·27	332·64	356·93

Children's acute	718·34	780·64	828·94
Other	511·49	575·96	603·40

We have made no estimate of the figures for the current year. These will become available when health authority accounts are submitted for 1984-85.

Low Income Families

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretay of State for Social Services if he will introduce new measures to counter hardships in low income families who are without heat or light due to fuel disconnections.

Mr. Whitney: We have no plans at present to introduce new measures to help low income families whose fuel supplies have been disconnected. The Government already provide substantial help through the social security system with the cost of fuel, including supplementary benefit heating additions on which we expect to spend some £400 million this financial year. The fuel industries have a range of schemes to help consumers pay bills in instalments and their present code of practice makes special provision for those with low incomes. People receiving supplementary benefit can be given payments to cover the cost of having their fuel supplies reconnected and, where appropriate, to have a prepayment meter installed; they may be assisted through the fuel direct scheme to retain their fuel supply and to pay their debts in instalments. Local authority social services departments also have powers to provide advice and guidance and, in exceptional circumstances, to make payments to help avoid the need to take children into care because of lack of fuel supplies.

Fuel Direct Scheme

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make a statement on the problems experienced on the fuel direct scheme;

(2) if he will investigate the administration of the fuel direct scheme, with a view to providing a more effective programme of monitoring at both local and national level.

Mr. Whitney: Fuel direct is a scheme devised to help people receiving supplementary benefit, who are threatened with disconnection of their gas or electricity supplies, to avoid disconnection and pay their debts. In 1982, the agreement between the Department and the fuel industries on the way in which the fuel direct scheme should be operating was revised and improvements made to the scheme. The agreement is published as appendix 9 of the S Manual, a copy of which is in the Library. In general, the scheme works well and we have no plans to conduct a special investigation of the administration of fuel direct or to take special steps to improve existing monitoring of the scheme. Later this year, however, we plan to introduce a microcomputer system which will assist and improve administration of the fuel direct scheme. We are also currently considering the findings of the supplementary benefit review which had as one of its main aims the improvement of the administration of the supplementary benefit scheme in general.

Preschool Playgroups Association

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received the report from the team of officials looking into the financial control and management of the Preschool Playgroups Association.

Mr. John Patten: Yes, and I have had constructive discussions with the Preschool Playgroups Association about the report's findings, which the association has indicated it finds very helpful. We have agreed on various measures which the association now has in train to strengthen their financial management.

Benefits

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates would be the current annual cost of raising to the long-term benefit rate the supplementary benefit payable to persons continuously unemployed for more than 12 months.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) on 27 November 1984 at column 765.

Post Mortem Examinations

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to change the regulations relating to the holding of post mortems on infants who die without apparent cause.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

The Home Secretary is concerned only with post mortem examinations ordered by coroners. Whether or not a post mortem examination should be ordered in a given case is a matter within the discretion of the coroner concerned. We have no plans to recommend to my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor any amendment to the Coroners Rules 1984.

Hospitals (Ethical Committees)

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospitals have ethical committees to consider research projects before they commence.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 166]: All clinical research projects should be approved by a suitable ethical committee. The number, location and organisation of such committees is a matter for the medical profession, but we would favour a policy whereby every institution where any significant amount of clinical research is done sets up its own ethical committee.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Coal Industry Dispute

4. Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what support the Government are providing for chief constables and police authorities as a result of the burden of policing in the coal dispute.

Mr. Brittan: The Government have shown the full extent of their support for the police in the unprecedented scale of our assistance with the additional costs of policing the dispute. I have already announced that for each police force area we shall meet 90 per cent. of the additional costs above the product of a penny rate and that no police authority's share of the cost will exceed the product of three quarters of a penny rate. We have also paid out advances of £128 million to help with police authorities cash flow.

29. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is considering introducing any new measures to seek to prevent intimidation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In his review of the law on public order my right hon. and learned Friend has considered the powers of the police and the courts to deal with intimidation, but he is not yet ready to announce his conclusions. In the course of the miners' dispute the police have acted vigorously to deal with assaults and other criminal offences. For details of charges brought under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875, which created a specific offence of intimidation, I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims).

37. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what use has been made of section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875 during the miners' dispute.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The figures which have been regularly given in answer to questions about charges for different offences during the miners' dispute relate to the main charge brought on arrest or summons. Further charges may be added subsequently. I understand that in total 643 charges have been brought under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875, including those charges added at a later stage. Details are as follows:

Police force area	Number of Charges	For activities on picket line	Subsection charged
Derbyshire	276	not available	not available
Durham	1	none	7(1)
Dyfed Powys	38	none	7(4)
Gwent	9	none	7(4)
Kent	34	none	7(4)
Nottinghamshire	174	90	7(4)
Staffordshire	6	5	7(1)—5 charges 7(1)—1 charge
Warwickshire	7	none	7(1)—3 charges 7(1) and (4)—4 charges
South Wales	23	none	7(4)
South Yorkshire	31	none	7(4)
West Yorkshire	44	none	7(1)—33 charges 7(2)—11 charges

Although a detailed breakdown for Derbyshire is not available, I understand that the majority of charges there related to activities on the picket line, and the majority of prosecutions have been brought under section 7(4).

39. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to make facilities available for the inquiry by the European Assembly into police conduct at pit heads.

52. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what co-operation his Department will be offering to the European Assembly's investigation on the policing of the miners' dispute.

75. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government concerning co-operation with the inquiry set up by the European Parliament to inquire into the policing of the miners' dispute in Britain.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Members to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) on 18 January, at column 238.

43. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest figure for miners arrested in connection with the National Union of Mineworkers—National Coal Board dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: 8,552 of the 9,374 people arrested in connection with the miners' dispute between 13 March and 29 January inclusive were miners.

44. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the maximum sentences passed by the courts for offences for which people have been convicted in connection with the miners' dispute.

63. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what sentences have been passed by the courts for the most serious offences committed during the miners' dispute.

Mr. Mellor: As at 25 January 1985, 112 defendants had been dealt with by the Crown court on charges related to the miners' strike, of whom 91 had been convicted. The offences of those convicted and the sentences passed on them are as follows:

Offence	Numbers convicted by case	Sentence

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints have been lodged against the police as a result of the miners' strike; and in how many of these complaints the inquiries have been completed.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The available information is that, in the period from 13 March 1984 to 15 January 1985, 534 complaints were made against police officers relating to actions arising from the policing of the dispute and that 100 of these have been withdrawn. Information about the number of complaints in respect of which investigation has been completed could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

56. Mr. Mark Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many custodial sentences have been passed for offences committed in the course of the miners' dispute.

Mr. Mellor: In the period 13 March to 29 January inclusive, 141 immediate custodial sentences were passed for offences committed in connection with the miners' dispute. These included one sentence of five years and one of three years for causing grievous bodily harm; and one sentence of three years and eight of two and a half years for arson.

58. Sir Edward Gardner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement about the policing of the miners' dispute.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am glad to reaffirm our full support for the police in the action they are taking to maintain order and to ensure that those who wish to exercise their right to go to work are able to do so.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers have been disciplined for incidents connected with the mining dispute; how many disciplinary charges are pending; and how many complaints have been made about the behaviour of police officers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In the period from 13 March 1984 to 22 January 1985, 537 complaints were made against police officers relating to actions arising during the course of the dispute. 102 of these have been withdrawn. Most of the remainder are still under investigation. I understand that the Police Complaints Board will include in its annual report for 1984 statistics on the number of investigation reports received by them which they have identified as dealing with complaints arising from the policing of the miners' strike and on the outcome of the investigations.

Civil Defence

9. Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Depaartment if he will collate centrally information on the training of civil defence volunteers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes. Information derived from local authorities, including that from visits made by the co-ordinator of volunteer effort in civil defence, will be collated by our officials with the assistance of the new civil defence adviser.

25. Mr. Martin Stevens asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what regulatory powers the Government will apply to ensure that civil defence grants are not misused by those local authorities opposed to civil defence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Civil defence (Grant) Regulations 1953 (as amended) make adequate provision for this purpose.

35. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the working party on standardisation of training of civil defence volunteers heard evidence from any volunteer bodies engaged in civil defence.

54. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence was taken by the working party on standardisation of training of civil defence volunteers.

65. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether evidence was taken by the working party on standardisation of training of civil defence volunteers from any of the Devon emergency planning officers or from members of the Devon emergency volunteers.

77. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the working party on standardisation of training of civil defence volunteers accepted any evidence from Sir Leslie Mavor.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The working party did not call for or take evidence in any formal way. It drew primarily on the experience of its members and the views it received from people such as Sir Leslie Mavor with experience in civil defence volunteer matters.

51. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the civil defence publications which his Department and Easingwold will make available in 1985; and what other informative materials he has plans for thereafter.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We expect to make the following documents available during the next 12 months or so:

The Consolidated Circular of Guidance to Local Authorities on Emergency Planning;

A technical handbook designed to help local authorities identify potential communal shelters;

A publication which will include advice on protective measures;

Revised material dealing with the effects of nuclear and other weapons;

A revised version of "Civil Defence—The Basic Facts";

A revised booklet on the work of the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation;

The reports of the Home Office-Civil Defence College working party on the standardisation of training of civil defence volunteers.

In addition, we hope to have a public information film on civil defence for issue before the end of the year.

69. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civil defence volunteers per 100,000 of the population will be needed to supply reasonable civil defence support.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number necessary to fulfil their responsibilities under the Civil Defence Regulations is for individual local authorities to decide in the light of local circumstances.

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide guidance for local authorities on travel and subsistence rates for civil defence volunteers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Reasonable expenditure thus incurred is eligible for grant-aid, but the rates are a matter for individual local authorities. Nevertheless, if my hon. Friend has a particular issue in mind I would be glad to hear from him.

Crime Prevention

12. Mr. Lightbown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he intends to encourage more local effort in crime prevention.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Home Office crime prevention unit has been actively encouraging and assisting a wide range of local initiatives aimed at preventing burglary, theft, autocrime and violence. This will continue. The unit is helping in the preparation of a report for local authorities and police forces giving examples of good practices. It is also revising the guidelines for local crime prevention panels; and promoting a number of regional panel conferences.

19. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how his Department plans to ensure that a higher priority is given by national and local government to crime prevention.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South-East (Mr. Lightbown) earlier today. In addition to the activities I have already referred to, we are co-operating with other central departments in giving more prominence to crime prevention nationally. The Home Office Standing Committee on Crime Prevention, which I chair myself, is considering ways of enhancing its role and influence. To stimulate public awareness, a £1·5 million television and press campaign was mounted in London and the midlands last autumn.

59. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further steps he intends to take to combat the increase in crime.

60. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he proposes to take to combat the increase in violent crime.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Chief officers of police are encouraged by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary to formulate strategies both for the prevention and investigation of crime which reflect prevailing local patterns of crime and which make best use of the resources at their disposal. Strategies for the most effective use of available resources against crime are also being developed by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. The Home Office crime prevention unit is supporting and encouraging local crime prevention activity involving the police, other relevant agencies and the public.

An effective criminal justice strategy must include an adequate range of sentencing powers which will command confidence. In addition to measures already introduced, the Government are supporting a private Member's measure by my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) to increase to life imprisonment the maximum penalty for persons convicted of trafficking in class A drugs and intends to introduce at the next legislative opportunity a measure similarly to increase the maximum penalty for persons convicted of carrying firearms in furtherance of crime.

Prisons

14. Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement about the use of overtime in prisons.

Mr. Mellor: Overtime working by prison officers in the current year is expected to cost nearly £97 million. Prison officers are working on average about 16½ hours overtime each week. This places a severe strain on them and their families and my right hon. and learned Friend is determined to use any reasonable way which can be found of reducing it.

Television Licence Fee

20. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he plans to increase the television licence fee.

Mr. Giles Shaw: As my right hon. and learned Friend indicated in his reply to the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) earlier today, he is considering an application from the BBC for increased licence fees.

33. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he as received regarding the British Broadcasting Corporation's request for an increased licence fee.

50. Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the British Broadcasting Corporation's application for an increase in its licence fee.

61. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many letters he has received on the subject of the cost of a television licence since the beginning of the Session.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) earlier today.

70. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next proposes to discuss the licence fee with the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present for a meeting with the BBC.

Wartime Broadcasting Service

21. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will take steps to incorporate the existing links between local authorities and their local radio stations into the wartime broadcasting service.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The purpose of the wartime broadcasting service is to ensure the survival of a basic national and regional sound broadcasting service if normal systems fail after a nuclear attack. The service will be extended to include local radio stations as appropriate and as resources permit.

Entry Clearance (Statistics)

22. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for the last 12 months, what percentage of refusals of entry clearance through the operation of the primary purpose rule was accounted for by men from the Indian subcontinent.

Mr. Waddington: This information is not available because the collection of the necessary data is confined to the Indian subcontinent.

32. Mr. Bevan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time taken to hear (a) an appeal from abroad against refusal of an entry clearance and (b) an appeal by a person in the United Kingdom against refusal to vary leave to remain; and what were the comparable waiting times in 1979.

Mr. Waddington: I understand from the appellate authorities that appeals from abroad against refusal of an entry clearance can be heard by an adjudicator by between three and nine months from the date on which the appellant's representative in the United Kingdom signifies his readiness to proceed with the appeal, depending on the centre at which the appeal is heard. Appeals against refusal of variation of leave to remain are heard on average between two to three months from the date on which the appeal is received by the appellate authorities.

During 1979 the average delay for all appeals was 14 months.

36. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for settlement on behalf of children were refused in the latest 12-month period because entry certificates had not been obtained prior to arrival in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: According to the readily available information, during the 12 months ending September 1984, a total of about 190 persons claiming to be dependants, including about 110 from the Commonwealth, were refused admission to the United Kingdom at ports of entry when seeking to enter for settlement without the entry clearance required by the immigration rules. To identify the number of children within these totals would involve disproportionate cost and it is not possible to say how many of the persons concerned would have qualified for and been granted entry certificates had they applied.

71. Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further representations he has received about the operation of the primary purpose rule in relation to applications for entry clearance by husbands of British citizens.

Mr. Waddington: During the last 12 months representations have been received from several sources, including right hon. and hon. Members, most of whom were writing on behalf of constituents. It is not possible, without disproportionate cost, to give precise figures.

Visiting Forces Act

23. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now take steps to gather information on the number of occasions on which visiting forces have claimed primary jurisdiction for their nationals under the terms of the Visiting Forces Act.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Police and Fire Services

24. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many, and which, metropolitan district councils have indicated an interest in controlling police and fire services within their area.

Mr. Giles Shaw: At the time of their initial response to "Streamlining the Cities" (Cmnd. 9063), six metropolitan districts (Rochdale, Wirral, Sefton, Solihull, Dudley and Wolverhampton) indicated their interest in various forms of district involvement with the police and fire services.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the cost of providing effective, fully operational headquarters for (a) police and (b) fire services for each metropolitan district area where this facility does not exist; and if he will list these costs.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Such estimates could be prepared only at disproportionate cost.

Drugs (Young Persons)

26. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is planning any further measures to prevent young people experimenting with dangerous drugs.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health has announced that the Government intend to launch a major education and prevention campaign directed at parents and young people. An advertising agency has now been asked to develop proposals for the campaign, taking into account information derived from market research commissioned by the Government.

Prevention of Terrorism

27. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the use of the prevention of terrorism legislation over the recent Christmas period will be included in the first annual review of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Brittan: Yes, but Sir Cyril Philips' task is concerned with the pattern of use of the powers under the Act; he will not be reporting in relation to individual cases.

53. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further plans he has to combat terrorism.

Mr. Brittan: I would refer my hon. Friend to my statement of 22 January, at columns 864-876, in which I announced new measures to combat terrorism. The Government will continue to monitor developments closely and give all necessary support to the agencies of law and order. We shall also continue to play a full part internationally in encouraging consultation and co-operation with other Governments in this field.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what point persons who are detained under the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism Act are logged as being a notifiable statistic; whether persons interviewed by police officers at ports of entry, including airports, under the provisions of the Act are advised that they are being so detained; how the procedure has varied between the Prevention of Terrorism Acts 1974, 1976 and the 1984 Act; if persons who are asked to fill in a card giving their details and whereabouts whilst in Ireland are notified as being examined under the provisions of the Act; and whether there have been any changes in statistical analysis of persons detained under the provisions of the 1984 Act and of the 1974 and 1976 Acts.

Mr. Brittan: All detentions under the Prevention of Terrorism Act or the supplemental order are recorded for statistical purposes. However, a person may be examined at a port for up to 12 hours without being detained; such examinations are recorded after one hour and at that point the person is notified in writing of his position. A person may be required under the supplemental order to complete a landing or embarkation card, but that would not be recorded for statistical purposes unless he was subsequently examined for more than one hour or detained.

There were no specific provisions on the collection of statistics or advice to persons examined in the 1974, 1976 or 1984 Acts. Full statistics on the operation of the legislation have been collected and published from 1979 in a series of quarterly bulletins, following a recommendation by Lord Shackleton; statistics of those examined for more than one hour but not detained have been collected and published from 1984, following a recommendation by Lord Jellicoe.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate the number of people held under the Prevention of Terrorism Act between 1 January 1983 and the present; and of these how many were detained (a) whilst Parliament was in recess and (b) while Parliament was sitting.

Mr. Brittan [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 275]: Information on detentions under the Prevention of Terrorism Acts is given in tables 1 and 2 of the latest quarterly Home Office Statistical Bulletin, issue No. 1/85. Of the total of 394 detained in 1983 and 1984, 120 were detained while Parliament was in recess, and 274 while Parliament was sitting.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate the number of people held under the Prevention of Terrorism Act from 1983 onwards together with (a) a breakdown of this total by country of origin, (b) the number of these whose period of detention was extended by his Department who were subsequently charged, (c) the number of these whose period of detention was extended by his Department who were subsequently released without charge and (d) a breakdown of the reasons for his Department's decision to extend the period of detention.

Mr. Brittan [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 275]: The available information is given in the following table. I consider personally applications for extensions of detention; each decision is taken on an individual basis and it would not be appropriate for me to discuss the reasons for them.

Racial Attacks

28. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his assessment of the incidence of racial attacks during the last 12 months.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are much concerned about racial attacks and racial incidents and are particularly disturbed that the total number of incidents involving Asian and black victims has increased.

The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has made this problem one of the two new priority objectives for the Metropolitan police in 1985. We will continue to give every support to the police in their efforts to develop more effective ways of dealing with racial attacks.

Detention Centres

30. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to alter the regime in detention centres.

Mr. Mellor: On 24 July 1984 my right hon. and learned Friend announced a programme to establish a consistent regime for the whole detention centre system. He will be announcing shortly his plans for the implementation of the new regime.

Chemical and Biological Weapons

31. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will include instruction in the properties and effects of chemical and biological weapons on courses at the Civil Defence college, Easingwold.

Mr. Giles Shaw: These effects are dealt with in a small number of specialised courses, and appropriate reference is made to them in others.

Schools (Police Visits)

34. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on police visits to schools for educational purposes in the metropolitan area.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has our full support in all his efforts to make contact with young people, including visits to schools.

Public Warning Systems

38. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the public warning system will differentiate between different types of attack.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Initial public warning of an air attack of whatever form will be given by sirens and radio broadcasts without differentiation. Following an attack, radio broadcasts will provide more specific information, and, if appropriate, maroons will also be used to indicate a danger of radioactive fallout.

Auld Report

40. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Auld report.

46. Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement about the reform of the Shops Act.

48. Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now make a statement about the Auld report on shop hours.

64. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will announce an early decision on the conclusions of the Auld report.

67. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now make a statement about the Auld report on shop hours.

72. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the reform of the Shops Act.

83. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement about the Auld report on shop hours.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave to questions from my hon. Friends the Members for Ravensbourne (Mr. Hunt) and for Halifax (Mr. Galley) earlier today.

British Broadcasting Corporation

41. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will establish a commission of inquiry to investigate and make recommendations on the future structure and finances of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has no present plans to do so.

Hong Kong (Vietnamese Refugees)

42. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations he has had on the implications for immigration policy in relation to Vietnamese refugees of the agreement on the future of Hong Kong.

Mr. Waddington: We have discussed the Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong with various individuals and organisations, but none of these discussions has been in the context of the agreement on the future of Hong Kong.

Police (Records)

45. Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied that all the records held by the special branch of the Metropolitan police contain only necessary and relevant information, properly authenticated, and that there is an effective system of updating information and destroying information no longer related to the discharge of special branch functions.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis is aware of the provisions of the Home Office guidelines on the work of a special branch (issued on 19 December 1984) and my right hon. and learned Friend is satisfied that he takes all the necessary steps to ensure that they are complied with the Metropolitan police special branch, both as to the keeping of records and more generally.

Independent Local Radio

49. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has discussed with the chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Authority the independent Broadcasting Authority's new policy on regulations for independent local radio.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Last autumn my right hon. and learned Friend discussed the regulation of independent local radio in general terms with the chairman and director-general of the IBA, and he has since written expressing his support for the approach recently outlined by the authority.

Drugs Abuse

55. Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further measures the Government intend to introduce to tackle the problem of drug abuse.

Mr. Mellor: The Ministerial Group is continuing to consider ways of developing the Government's strategy. Meanwhile, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is providing 160 more customs officers, mainly to counter drug smuggling; my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has commissioned an advertising agency to draw up proposals for a major education and prevention campaign and is providing more resources for prevention, treatment and rehabilitation; and the Government will be supporting the Bill which my hon. Friend the Members for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) has introduced to increase to life imprisonment the maximum penalty for trafficking in class A drugs.

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what number and proportion of prison service offices are trained to handle the problem of prisoners who are drug misusers; and whether he is satisfied with their number.

Mr. Mellor: All prison officers receive a half day's training on the subject of drugs and their misuse, during the initial basic training at the Officers' Training School, Wakefield. Further training is given nationally, regionally and within establishments every year. With regard to the detection of drugs, specialist training in this area is provided for certain dog handlers and the number of such specialists is currently being increased. The Prison Service College is also preparing a video film and teaching pack on drug detection which will be issued to all establishments in 1985 for staff training purposes.

Police (Surveillance Techniques)

57. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will issue further guidelines to the special branch of the police on the use of surveillance techniques and the definition of the term subversive in the context of the recent guidelines which he has drawn up for them.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Special branch applies the definition of subversion formulated by Lord Harris of Greenwich in 1975, and quoted in paragraph 20 of the "Guidelines on the Work of a Special Branch" issued on 19 December 1984; "Subversive activities are . . . those which threaten the safety or well-being of the State, and which are intended to undermine or overthrow Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means"—Official Report, House of Lords, 26 February 1975, Vol. 357, c. 947. The definition is well understood by chief officers and we do not consider that any further guidance is needed on this point.

Rape

62. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of alleged rape were reported in 1984; and how many resulted in conviction.

Mr. Mellor: Statistics concerning rape include attempted rape and aiding or abetting an offence of rape. Numbers of offences of rape recorded by the police are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (table 2.9 of the volume for 1983, Cmnd. 9349). In the first nine months of 1984 the police recorded 1,077 such offences. Information on convictions for rape is also published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables"—table S1.1(A), Vol. 1 for magistrates courts and table 2.1(A), Vol. 2 for the Crown court. Convictions in one year do not necessarily relate to offences recorded by the police in that year.

Prisoners (Parole)

66. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any further proposals for the exclusion of prisoners from parole, following the decision of the Court of Appeal in Findlay and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Mr. Mellor: No prisoners are excluded from parole consideration by the policy held to be lawful by the House of Lords in the case of Findlay and others. We have no further proposals at present to change our policy on parole.

Community Radio

68. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's current proposals for the development of community radio.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 23 January at column 417-18.

Police (Special Branch)

73. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to amend the guidelines issued by his Department on the work of the special branch.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so.

76. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what safeguards exist to ensure that special branch officers adhere to the guidelines issued by his Department.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief officer of each force is responsible for ensuring that the activities of his special branch are properly controlled and supervised, having regard to the provisions of the Home Office "Guidelines on the work of a Special Branch", issued on 19 December 1984. Special branches are also subject to inspection by Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary in the same way as other parts of police forces.

Police Rent Allowance

74. Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on future arrangements for police rent allowance.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The police arbitration tribunal recommended that the existing arrangements for calculating rent allowances should remain unchanged. My right hon. and learned Friend has accepted that recommendation. Under the Police Regulations, he has to approve force maximum limits, and he has thought it right to advise police authorities of the considerations which should be taken into account before giving approval.

Thames Valley Police Force

78. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reach a conclusion on the proposed increase in the establishment of the Thames Valley police force.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has already done so. The police authority was informed on 25 January that he is prepared to approve an increase of 20 police posts in the current financial year and 30 posts with effect from 1 April 1985, provided that the police authority will find the necessary finance for these posts and its proposed civilianisation programme.

Racism (Police Training)

79. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied with the operation of racism awareness training course for the police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Home Office sponsored an experimental series of four courses in racism awareness training for police officers. An evaluation of that training was recently published. We are satisfied that training of this kind has a contribution to make to the community and race relations courses that are currently being developed by the police.

The Home Office has also set up at Brunel university a centre for the study of community and race relations, with an emphasis on developing the training skills of police trainers in this subject.

Immigration Interviews (Tape Recording)

80. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce on an experimental basis the tape recording of immigration interviews.

Mr. Waddington: No. The outcome of a further review by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office of the possible use of tape recordings in interviews by entry clearance officers abroad is awaited. Until it is received no decision will be taken about the use of tape recorders in immigration interviews in this country.

Metropolitan Police

81. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ask the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to defer plans for reorganising the district and area organisation of the police until the proposals have been debated in Parliament.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner's plans for reorganising the Metropolitan police will be implemented over the next two years. As my right hon. and learned Friend said on 17 January, at columns 175-76, in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) he hopes, subject to the usual consultations, that it will be possible to find time before Easter to give the House an opportunity to debate the Commissioner's recent report to him on his plans and priorities for the coming year.

82. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to assess (a) public support and (b) public opposition amongst the community in relation to the proposed changes in the management structure of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has assured me that he will be consulting widely about the detailed development and implementation of his plans to restructure the force within the broad outline he has already announced. My right hon. and learned Friend has invited right hon. and hon. Members for constituencies in the Metropolitan police district to discuss with him, as police authority, any matters arising from the Commissioner's recent report to him, including the reorganisation of the force.

Young Offenders

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation amending the present statutory arrangements for the treatment of young offenders by adopting throughout England and Wales the hearing system for children in trouble currently practised in Scotland.

Mr. Mellor: No. We believe that there is a need for fuller consideration and discussion of this and other alternatives to the present system (such as the establishment of family courts with some jurisdiction over juvenile offenders, as envisaged by the Social Services Committee in its second report of last Session) before any conclusion is reached.

Prison Rules

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners on rule 43 worked in their cells on the most recent convenient date; and what types of work they were employed in.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available centrally. Efforts are made to provide prisoners on rule 43 with work where local circumstances, including the availability of suitable work, permit. In the case of prisoners on rule 43 for their own protection this may include work in association.

Leeds Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners contracted salmonella in the recent outbreak at Leeds prison; how many of these prisoners shared cells; and when salmonella was first diagnosed.

Mr. Mellor: The first prisoner at Leeds prison reported sick suffering from what proved to be salmonella poisoning on 13 October 1984. Five other cases were subsequently confirmed. All but one of these prisoners had been sharing cells at the time they became ill.

Terrorist Offences (Statistics)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners had been convicted of terrorist offences at the most recent convenient date; and how many of these were serving life sentences;

(2) how many terrorist murderers were in prison in England and Wales on the most recent convenient date; and for how long the longest serving has been detained.

Mr. Mellor: The only information which is readily available relates to prisoners who are currently in custody in England and Wales and in category A. It does not cover prisoners who have never been in category A or who have been removed from category A. As at 25 January 1985 there were 64 prisoners convicted of terrorist-type offences, of whom 34 were serving life sentences. Twenty-two prisoners were convicted of terrorist-type murders, the longest serving of whom was first received in custody in England and Wales in October 1973.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many terrorist murderers have been released from prison to date.

Mr. Mellor: The only information which is readily available on prisoners convicted of murders relating to terrorism concerns prisoners who were in custody in England and Wales in category A at the time of release. One such prisoner has been released; he was suffering from terminal cancer and died three days later.

Criminal Responsibility (Minimum Age)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the minimum age of criminal responsibility in each country of western Europe.

Mr. Mellor: There is no short or simple answer; I shall write to the hon. Member.

Police Joint Boards

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many chief constables have made known to him their views on possible breakaways from the proposed police joint boards; and how many of them are in favour of such boards.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No chief constable has indicated to my right hon. and learned Friend that he favours a change in existing force area, or in the proposed joint boards.

Zeus Security Consultants

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions he has employed Zeus Security Consultants; and for what purpose.

Mr. Brittan: None.

Public Processions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will detail all the circumstances he takes into consideration prior to banning or approving a public procession;

(2) if he will list his powers to ban processions (a) within the Greater London area and (b) elsewhere.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has no powers to ban processions. In London that power rests with the Commissioner of Police, and elsewhere with the borough or district council. Section 3 of the Public Order Act 1936 provides that in London the Commissioner of Police for the City of London or the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis may, subject to the Home Secretary's consent, make an order banning all public processions or any class of procession but only if the believes that his powers to impose conditions on processions under section 3(1) of the Act will be insufficient to prevent serious disorder. Outside London if a chief constable similarly believes that his powers under section 3(1) will not be sufficient to prevent serious public disorder, he must apply to the borough or district council for an order banning all public processions or any class of procession: and the council may make such an order, subject to my right hon. and learned Friend's consent. In deciding whether or not to consent to a banning order the Home Secretary considers in each case the risk of serious public disorder and the resources available to the police to control it, and makes a judgment of what he believes will be in the public interest.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide such details as are readily available of each order prohibiting processions made by him under the Public Order Act 1936 in each of the past five years and to date.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The following is the information in respect of banning orders made in England and Wales under section 3(2) or section 3(3) of the Act in the past five years:

Mentally Abnormal Offenders

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisifed that there are available on a national basis an adequate number of places for the detention of mentally abnormal offenders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Decisions on how mentally disordered offenders should be dealt with are a matter for the courts, and the provision of hospital places for those detainable under the Mental Health Act 1983 is for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. The range of facilities in the National Health Service is currently being expanded through the provision of regional secure units; and where the treatment is required under conditions of special security a place in a special hospital can be provided by my right hon. Friend. Difficulties sometimes arise, not least where there may be disagreement concerning a person's clinical condition or the suitability of a hospital placement; where this involves particular cases for which the Home Secretary has responsibilities he and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services together seek to resolve them.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many London authorities or local authority organisations included in their responses to Cmnd. 9063 comments supporting the retention of a single Londonwide fire brigade; how many were opposed to the retention of a single fire brigade; and how many suggested special organisational changes for London's fire brigade when commenting on paragraph 2.19 of Cmnd. 9063.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Responses to Cmnd. 9063 indicated little support for change in the organisation of the London Fire Brigade. No London borough or local government organisation was opposed to the retention of a Londonwide brigade or suggested special organisational arrangements for its management by the joint fire board.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what sums of money, both revenue and capital, will be made available to the London joint board for fire to cover the period from 1 September 1985 to 31 March 1986 to enable it to employ staff, acquire land and premises and enter into contracts; and what will be the source of those funds.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Clause 67 of the Local Government Bill would enable the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority to borrow in order to defray expenses incurred before the abolition date. The amount borrowed would be subject to a limit to be determined under subsection (2) and would have to be repaid before the end of the financial year 1986-87.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which responses to Cmnd. 9063 led him to propose the setting up of four area committees within the proposed joint board for the London Fire Brigade.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The idea of area committees originated from the Government's consideration of earlier proposals for the reorganisation of the London Fire Brigade, notably those published by the Greater London council in 1981.

Assisted Prison Visits Scheme

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how long a couple must have lived together as man and wife to be eligible for assistance with the cost of fares under the assisted prison visits scheme.

Mr. Mellor: The assisted prison visits scheme is administered by the Department of Health and Social Security on behalf of the Home Office. In deciding for the purpose of processing claims under this scheme whether the couple have been "living together as man and wife", I understand that the Department of Health and Social Security applies broadly the same principles as it applies in relation to supplementary benefit claims, which are set out in the supplementary benefits handbook. Under those principles there is no fixed minimum period of cohabitation required to prove such a relationship, but where the couple have cohabited for only a few months there would have to be clear evidence that the case met the other criteria set out in the handbook.

Police Manpower

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give his estimates of the changes in police manpower at the ranks represented by (a) the Association of Chief Police Officers, (b) the Superintendents Association and (c) the Police Federation which would be required if the police authority function were devolved from the metropolitan county level to each of the 36 metropolitan districts of England.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Such estimates could be prepared only at disproportionate cost.

Joint Fire Authorities

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of the population of England outside the Greater London council and metropolitan areas are served by joint fire authorities.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There are no such authorities in England.

Unsentenced Prisoners, Winson Green

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why it has already taken six weeks to check the records of 23 unsentenced prisoners who were segregated or put in solitary confinement at Winson Green prison during November 1984 to ascertain whether there is any reference to his noble Friend, Lord Elton, in the records concerning their segregation or solitary confinement; and when he expects these inquiries to be completed.

Mr. Mellor: This reply also contains information pursuant to the reply of 20 December 1984, at column 291.

The inquiries have been completed. They show that in addition to the 25 unsentenced prisoners segregated during November 1984 at Birmingham under rule 43 of the Prison Rules, one unsentenced prisoner was segregated under Prison Rule 48(2) pending adjudication and no unsentenced prisoners were awarded cellular confinement as a punishment. There is no reference to my noble Friend Lord Elton in any of the records pertaining to the prisoners' segregation. The time taken to obtain the information resulted from the need to look through the prisoners' records at Birmingham and other establishments to which some of the prisoners had been transferred.

Winson Green Prison (Prisoners' Letters)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners on remand were segregated from other prisoners or put in solitary confinement at Winson Green prison during November; and whether there is any reference to his noble Friend Lord Elton in any records concerning their segregation or solitary confinement.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 20 December 1984, c. 291]: The correct figures for the prisoners segregated at Birmingham prison during November 1984 were 15 under Prison Rule 43 for their own protection and 10 under the same rule in the interests of good order and discipline.

WALES

Dairy Industry

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action he proposes to safeguard the interests of Welsh milk producers, in view of the non-compliance in the milk quota scheme by other European Economic Community member states.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Government have made it very clear that the supplementary levy arrangements must be applied properly by all member states. We are not prepared to see our producers disadvantaged compared with others. We are keeping a close watch on measures introduced by other member states and carefully monitoring available statistics. We are also maintaining pressure on the Commission on these points, since it has the authority to require member states to implement arrangements properly and to take any necessary action, and will certainly bring to its attention any evidence of failure to comply with the rules.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales currently receiving unemployment benefit have never been in employment; what percentage of the unemployed, and how many, in Wales are now long-term unemployed; and what is his estimate of the number in Wales aged 60 plus years who no longer figure in the unemployment total but who previously did so.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: People who have not been employed since leaving school are not entitled to unemployment benefit but may receive supplementary benefit. The number in this category in Wales in December 1984 was 21,531.

As at October 1984, 40·3 per cent. or 71,901 people in Wales had been unemployed for over one year.

The 1983 Budget provisions resulted in an estimated 9,000 men over 60 no longer having to sign on in Wales during the period April to August 1983. No estimates are available of the number currently affected although the total should be little changed since the number of men who have subsequently become eligible under the Budget provisions will have been broadly offset by those previously eligible reaching retirement age.

Regional Aid

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the average amount of time companies in Wales will now have to wait for applications for regional aid to be processed following the announcement of a moratorium on payments by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The average time taken to process applications from companies in Wales for regional development grants at the present high rate of receipts of applications is between 8-10 weeks. The four-month moratorium on payments takes effect from the date of approval of an application.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many companies in Mid-Glamorgan will be affected by the moratorium on regional aid announced by the Government; and if he will estimate the sum of money involved.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The number of companies with qualifying premises in Mid-Glamorgan eligible to receive regional development grant and thus with the potential to be affected by the four-month moratorium is 818. It is not possible to estimate the sum of money involved but for Wales as a whole it is possible that some £23 million will be subject to deferment during 1985-86.

Nuclear Attack (Effects)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information his Department makes available to Welsh farmers as to the consequences for them of a nuclear attack in Britain.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information for farmers is contained in a booklet, "Home Defence and the Farmer", prepared by the Agriculture Departments and published in 1958. A new edition will become available after a revision of the text, which is now in train, has been completed.

Regional Emergency Committee

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the dates of the meetings of the Welsh regional emergency committee over the last seven years; and what were the reasons for convening the committee on each occasion.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Wales emergency committee was convened on Friday 12 January 1979 and meetings were held each day (excluding Sunday 14 January) until Thursday 1 February. The reasons were industrial action by road haulage and bakery workers coinciding with a prolonged period of severe winter weather. I have already referred in my answer of 15 January 1985 at column 102 to a meeting held on 20 November 1984.

Dykes (Grants)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether the reconstruction and repair of dykes used for enclosing fields and for windbreak purposes on farms in Wales will be eligible for grant under the marginal land schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The provision, replacement or improvement of dykes are eligible for grant under the agriculture and horticulture grant scheme and agriculture and horticulture development scheme and farmers in the less favoured area may qualify for enhanced rates of grant. Grant is not available under either scheme for repair work.

Marginal Land

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy that when considering, after 31 July 1985, appeals against refusal to designate land as marginal land, his Department will not, at the same time, reconsider the designation of those lands which have already been defined as marginal land.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In any reassessment of areas for less-favoured area status further consideration of land currently designated cannot be ruled out.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Trends

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretay of State for Employment what have been the trends in employment in industries and services which formerly fell within the scope of wages council, but which no longer do so.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is not available because the coverage of the wages councils that have been abolished does not correspond to industrial groups for which estimates are prepared.

Median Weekly Earnings

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the median wage and median earnings for male and female workers for a standard working week.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest available information on the median weekly earnings of full-time adult male and female employees, distinguishing manual and non-manual employees, is for April 1984 and is shown in table 1 of "New Earnigs Survey 1984, Part A," a copy of which is in the Library.

Abbeystead Pumping Station

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman asked the Secretary of State for Employment when the report on the explosion at Abbeystead pumping station is to be published.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I expect the report to be published on 7 February. I shall make an announcement.

Skillcentres

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what has been the number of full-time instructors by course in each of the last three years at the Castle Bromwich skillcentre, Tameside drive, Birmingham;

(2) what was the cost to public funds of (a) acquiring the site and (b) building the Castle Bromwich skillcentre, Tameside drive, Birmingham B35; and when it was completed;

(3) what, for each year since it has been open, has been the number of courses available by title, place and take-up at the Redditch skillcentre;

(4) what has been the waiting list for courses by name in each of the last three years at the Redditch skillcentre;

(5) what has been the number of full-time instructors by course in each of the last three years at Redditch skillcentre;

(6) what was the cost to public funds of (a) acquiring the site and (b) building the Redditch skillcentre; and when it was completed;

(7) what has been the total cost to public funds of equipping the Redditch skillcentre; and what has been the cost by year for any subsequent re-equipment or refurbishing of the premises;

(8) what has been the total cost to public funds of equipping the Castle Bromwich skillcentre, Tameside drive, Birmingham; and what has been the cost by year for any subsequent re-equipment or refurbishing of the premises;

(9) what, for each year since it has been open, has been the number of courses available by title, places and take-up at the Castle Bromwich skillcentre, Tameside drive, Birmingham;

(10) what has been the waiting list for courses by name in each of the last three years at the Castle Bromwich skillcentre, Tameside drive, Birmingham.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall write to the hon. Member shortly and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Youth Training and Employment

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many, by number and percentage, of those young people completing a youth opportunities programme or youth training scheme have transferred into immediate full-time employment at the end of the scheme, for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Kidney Failure and Infertility

Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the expenditure in the most recent year for which records are available on (a) research into kidney failure and (b) research into infertility.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. The Department of Health and Social Security also supports some research through its health service research programme. I understand that expenditure on research projects relevant to kidney failure by the MRC and the DHSS in the financial year 1983-84 — including expenditure by the MRC on projects which could prove relevant to kidney failure—was £664,000 and £166,000, respectively.

As to expenditure on research into infertility, I refer my hon. Friend to my answer on 9 January, at columns 431-2, to my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton). It is possible that research work relevant to kidney failure and infertility is also being conducted in universities and medical schools using funds allocated for teaching and research on the advice of the University Grants Committee, but no details of such work are available. The medical charities may also be funding research in these fields.

Medical Research Council (Projects)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list, by location, the research projects currently funded by the Medical Research Council; if he will indicate the level of grant allocated to each project; and whether these projects are based on clinical or laboratory research.

Mr. Brooke: Details of research projects supported by the Medical Research Council can be found in the council's handbook for 1984-85, a copy of which is in the Library. Information on the level of grant allocated to each project and whether these projects are based on clinical or laboratory research could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Trust Corporations

Mr. Weetch asked the Attorney-General whether Her Majesty's Government will alter the Non-Contentious Probate Rules 1954 to permit trust corporations to make personal applications for grants of representation.

The Attorney-General: The non-contentious probate rules are made by the President of the Family Division with the Lord Chancellor's concurrence. The Lord Chancellor has no plans to invite the President to permit trust corporations to make personal applications for grants of representation.

Mr. Weetch asked the Attorney-General whether he will introduce legislation to amend section 23 of the Solicitors Act 1974 to permit trust corporations to make applications for grants of representation.

The Attorney-General: No.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Trading Interests (Protection)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will invoke the Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980 in respect of attempts by the United States Government to impose extra-territorially its Export Administration Act.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to do so but would be prepared to take this course where he is satisfied that it is the most effective way of safeguarding legitimate United Kingdom interests.

Technology Transfer (Restrictions)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will place in the Library copies of the Government's submissions to the European Community Commission concerning United States restrictions on technology transfer.

Mr. Channon: I have arranged for this to be done.

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to protect British companies from the imposition of fines or from blacklisting by the United States Government under the extra-territorial application of its Export Administration Act when those companies are innocent of any offence under United Kingdom legislation.

Mr. Channon: I will continue to urge on the United States Government the need to abandon the claim to apply the Export Administration Act, and regulations made under it, extra-territorially to companies in the United Kingdom. This claim, which the Government consider to be without foundation in international law, is an avoidable source of friction between the United States and all her allies; and must in the long term encourage United Kingdom companies to free themselves from reliance on United States technology.

Beer

Mr. Torney asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received alleging that the brewers are making excess profits on sales of beer in the south of England through charging higher wholesale prices to their outlets there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: I have received no such representations.

ENERGY

Domestic Disconnections

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will provide details of how the Electricity and Gas Consumer Councils are monitoring the operation of the voluntary code of practice on disconnections.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The area electricity consultative councils and the regional gas consumer councils receive from the industries information on disconnections at regular intervals; and information on any specific case is available for inspection and discussion. Liaison arrangements between a particular fuel board and its respective consultative or consumer council is a matter for local agreement.

Consumers and Fuel Industries (Relationship)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now consider seeking to introduce a statutory code of practice to govern the relationship between consumers and the fuel industries.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: No.

TRANSPORT

Buses

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will compare the safety record of long-haul bus operations before and after deregulation.

Mr. David Mitchell: Separate statistics are not available for long distance express coach services. Overall there has been a decline in bus and coach user casualty rates—all severities—from 371 per 100 million vehicle kilometres in 1979 to 314 in 1983. Similarly bus and coach vehicle accident involvement rates—all severities—fell from 502 per 100 million vehicle kilometres in 1979 to 388 in 1983.

British Rail

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport on what basis load factors for British Rail passenger services are determined or approved by his Department.

Mr. David Mitchell: Within the objectives my right hon. friend gave the chairman of British Rail on 24 October 1983 the board has the responsibility for the day-to-day operation of the railway, including the setting of load factor objectives. The board has developed load factor objectives for its London and south-east services which were discussed with my Department and agreed with the Central Transport Consultative Committee. We have welcomed those targets and look forward to their achievement.

Airports (Passengers)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what information he has as to the percentage increase in passenger movements in each of the past three years at London Heathrow, London Gatwick, Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Birmingham, Cardiff and Belfast Aldergrove airports;

(2) what information he has to the total number of passengers for the past 12 months at the following airports: London Heathrow, London Gatwick, Manchester, Glasgow, Birmingham, Edinburgh, Cardiff and Belfast Aldergrove.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The information is shown in the following table:

	Percentage increase in passenger movements			Total number of terminal passengers
	1982	1983	1984	1984
London Heathrow	0·0	+ 1·3	+ 8·9	29·1M
London Gatwick	+ 3·9	+11·8	+11·8	14·0M
Manchester	+ 5·7	+ 1·9	+17·0	6·0M
Glasgow	+ 6·1	+ 1·4	+12·4	2·7M
Edinburgh	+ 7·2	+ 6·1	+16·8	2·0M
Birmingham	+ 6·5	− 0·3	+ 8·5	1·5M
Cardiff	+22·6	+ 6·3	+11·0	0·4M
Belfast Aldergrove	+ 2·5	− 3·1	+13·8	1·6M

Lighthouse Keepers

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Transport from which date he expects to implement the new pay structure for lighthouse keepers that was agreed between the union and employers.

Mr. David Mitchell: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the structure on which agreement was reached in 1982 between the Northern Lighthouse Board and the Transport and General Workers Union. On 31 August 1983 I told the chairman of the board that I had no objection in principle to these restructuring proposals, but that I could accept their costs only to the extent that they could be accommodated within the then existing light-keepers' pay and allowances bill. The matter rests there, but my offer remains open.

Pesticides (Aerial Spraying)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the area of land sprayed with pesticides in thousands of hectares by (a) fixed-wing aircraft, (b) helicopters and (c) in total for each year since 1978.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The available information is as follows:

*Areas Sprayed with Pesticides by Aircraft in Thousands of Hectares

	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
Fixed wing	178	205	202	161	170
Helicopters	156	145	133	111	139
Unknown	3	—	31	23	51
Total	336	350	366	295	360

* Corrected for non returns.

Comparable figures do not exist for the area treated with ground machines, but it is estimated that 5·3 million hectares of crops and grass were treated with pesticides once or more often in 1982.

Marconi RCMM

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether full tests have now been carried out on the Marconi RCMM, remote computer maintenance and monitoring system; and if it is being considered for use throughout Britain's motorways and tunnels.

Mrs. Chalker: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to the Marconi environmental control system installed in the Holmesdale and Bell commons tunnels on the M25 to monitor visibility and pollution from exhaust fumes. The system has been tested and accepted.

A similar Marconi system has been accepted for the A1(M) Hatfield tunnel which at present is under construction.

Wider use of such systems may be considered, where appropriate, and would be the subject of specification and competitive tendering.

M25 (Warning Signals)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport why it will take three years to install improved emergency warning signals with automatic incident detection on the M25 motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: Automatic incident detection is being provided on the M25 initially within, and on the approaches to, the Holmesdale and Bell common tunnels. Thereafter, it is proposed to extend the facility to the approaches to the Dartford tunnel.

The signal installation programme is currently being reviewed.

London Regional Transport

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those functions of London Regional Transport upon which he will answer parliamentary questions.

Mrs. Chalker: I will, of course, answer questions on all functions of London Regional Transport which fall within my ministerial responsibilities. In accordance with the normal practice governing ministerial responsibility for nationalised industries, this excludes matters relating to the day-to-day management of the industry. There may also be matters of commercial confidence which it would not be appropriate for me to make public.

Pavement Parking

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to provide for a system of fixed penalty fines for pavement parking; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Fixed penalty notices already apply to many pavement parking offences. There are no plans at present to extend current legislation.

Road Traffic Law (Review)

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he can now announce his plans for a review of road traffic law.

Mr. Ridley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and I are concerned that road traffic law should not only promote road safety and efficient traffic management, but should also be fair, easy to understand, and capable of effective enforcement. The present law, which has developed piecemeal, does not always fulfil these aims.

We propose to continue the process of reform first announced in our election manifesto of 1979 by reviewing a number of aspects of the law which are causing particular difficulties.

With the agreement of our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland we are therefore setting up a small review with these terms of reference.

"To consider what improvements might be made to the following aspects of road traffic law, particularly in respect of simplification, effectiveness and acceptability, taking account of their relationship with other aspects of road traffic law:

(a) the structure of and penalties for the offences in sections 1-3 of the Road Traffic Act 1972: causing death by reckless driving; reckless driving, and careless driving;

(b) whether the present penalty points system needs any amendment, and, in particular, whether offences which are endorseable with penalty points can be divided into "points" and "no points" offences;

(c) the structure of and penalties for offences relating to —

i. driver licensing
ii. construction and use and
iii. failure to comply with traffic signs;

(d) whether new types of penalty for traffic offences would be appropriate in place of or in addition to existing types of penalty, in particular the possible wider application of statutory driving tests for certain types of offences or in cetain circumstances.

The review will be carried out by an independent chairman, a second outside member and members from my department and from the Home Office. Dr. Peter North, principal of Jesus college, Oxford, has accepted our invitation to chair the review body, and Professor Richard Alsopp, Professor of Transport Studies, University College, London, to be the second outside member. The official members will be:

Home Office
Mr. G. L. Angel
Mr. P. Harris
Department of Transport
Mr. T. H. Hall
Mr. D. M. Smith

We hope that the review body, which will invite evidence from interested parties, will be able to report on these matters next year. The process of reform is a continuous one and we may wish to refer further matters to the review in due course.

Crash Barriers

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the order of priority and timetable of his Department for the installation of crash barriers on the next 20 dual carriageways in England and Wales.

Mrs. Chalker [pursuant to the reply, 28 January 1985, c. 13]: The information requested is as follows:

	Dual Carriageway Project	Start Date
1.	A 406 South Woodford to Barking Relief Road, Contract 2	February 1985
2.	A 69 Team Valley Grade Separated Junction	February 1985

SCOTLAND

Pesticides (Aerial Spraying)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total amount of land sprayed with pesticides using aerial spraying techniques by the Forestry Commission for each of the last five years for which information is available.

Mr. John MacKay: The following areas were sprayed out of the Forestry Commission's total productive woodland holding of some 900,000 hectares:

Year	Area (hectares)
1980	1,515
1981	249
1982	160
1983	679
1984	3,727

Dementia

Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons in Scotland suffer from dementia; whether there are any regional differences in is incidence; and whether any estimate has been made of the likely rate of increase of the malady over the next decade.

Mr. John MacKay: As statistics about the total number of persons in Scotland suffering from dementia are not kept centrally, it is not possible to say whether there are any regional differences in its incidence or to estimate whether the incidence is likely to change over the next decade.

Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what expenditure is made annually in Scotland on research into a cure for dementia.

Mr. John MacKay: Information relating to all medical research being conducted in Scotland is not available centrally. However, the Scottish Home and Health Department is currently supporting eight projects relevant to this area for which total funding of approximately £305,000 has been allocated.

NHS (Employment Statistics)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will give a breakdown as to how many new doctors, nurses and auxiliary staff have been employed by the National Health Service in Scotland since May 1979, giving separate figures for each region, year by year, to date, indicating the net increase and number for each category since May 1979.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 22 January 1985, c. 388]: Figures for new doctors, nurses and auxiliary staff by region are not held centrally. The whole-time equivalent numbers of staff in post in the Scottish health board areas from 1979 to 1984 are as follows, showing net increases, in numerical and percentage terms, for each category:

Scottish Special Housing Association

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will set out the Scottish Special Housing Association's income to its housing revenue account, under the heading deficit subsidy, rents and other income, for each of the years from 1978-79 to the present;

(2) if he will set out the Scottish Special Housing Association's expenditure from its housing revenue account, under the headings, loan charges, repairs-maintenance, management and other, for each of the years from 1978-79 to 1984-85; and what is the estimated expenditure under these headings in 1985-86;

(3) if he will set out the Scottish Special Housing Association's capital spending as broken down between new build, modernisation and any other relevant items for each of the years from 1979-80 to the present;

(4) if he will set out for the Scottish Special Housing Association expenditure from the housing revenue account on repairs-maintenance and management per house for each of the years from 1978-79 to 1984-85 and the estimated expenditure under these headings in 1985-86.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 24 January 1985, c. 517]: The information requested is as follows. Most of the figures for the years concerned are contained in the annual reports of the Scottish Special Housing Association.

Fishing Vessels

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number and types of fishing vessels acquired by fishermen in the years 1979 to 1983 with financial assistance of the Highlands and Islands Development Board and (b) the yards where these vessels were built.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 179]: This information is set out in the following table:

Teachers (Salaries)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the request by Scottish teachers for an independent review of their salaries.

Mr. Younger [pursuant to his reply, 11 December 1984, c. 399.]: At their request I had a joint meeting with both sides of the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education (SJNC(SE)) on 28 January and explained my position in greater detail. After a full discussion, the management side indicated that it would be prepared to undertake a review within the statutory framework of the SJNC(SE), embracing both pay and conditions of service, on the lines which I had previously suggested. I asked the teachers' side to give further careful consideration to this possibility. I emphasised that I remained ready to consider any package of proposals resulting from such a review on its merits and within the framework of the Government's plans for public expenditure in Scotland.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Community Institutions

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to ensure that Parliament is consulted before Her Majesty's Government suggest, or agree provisionally, any changes in the powers, responsibilities and relationships of existing European Economic Community institutions.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Ad Hoc Committee on Institutional Questions (Dooge Committee) is considering a number of ideas concerning the Community's institutions, including those in "Europe—The Future" (copies of which are available in the Library of the House). Member states are not however committed by the Dooge Committee. The final report of the committee will be considered by Heads of Government at the June European Council. Parliament will have an opportunity to consider any proposals for institutional change arising out of that report.

Islamic Terrorist Squads

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has evidence that Islamic terrorist squads supported by Iran are prepared to launch attacks on personal and property targets in the United Kingdom or elsewhere in European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Renton: There have been a number of terrorist attacks in western Europe against Iranians who were formerly senior officials in the pre-revolutionary Government. We are naturally always on the look-out for evidence of plans for any terrorist attacks.

European Council

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs under what article of the treaty of Rome the Heads of Governments of the European Communities constituted the European Council; and under what article they established permanent working groups.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The European Council was set up by Heads of Government to provide general political impetus to the Community. It was not set up as such by the Treaty of Rome. However, when the European Council acts in matters within the scope of the European Communities, it does so in its capacity as the Council of Ministers within the meaning of the treaties (article 2 of the Merger Treaty).

The two committees set up by the Fontainbleu European Council are ad hoc groups composed of personal representatives of Heads of Government. They are due to complete their work by March 1985.

Amnesty International

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Amnesty International is in receipt of public funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Amnesty International is not in receipt of public funds.

British Refugee Council (Report)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his meeting with the Asia Committee of the British Refugee Council on 22 January on its report, "Behind Barbed Wire".

Mr. Luce: Members of the Asia Committee of the British Refugee Council called on me on 22 January. We had a wide-ranging discussion about the question of Vietnamese refugees, in particular matters relating to those refugees who are currently in Hong Kong awaiting resettlement, and ways in which this problem might be resolved.

Unilateral Nuclear Disarmament

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 21 January, Official Report, column 310, what studies are available to him on unilateral nuclear disarmament measures which display the necessary balance and depth, referred to in his reply to the hon. Member for Walthamstow; and if he will list the authors in each case.

Mr. Luce: Alternative approaches to nuclear disarmament have been the subject of numerous studies and commentaries, which it would not be possible to list except at disproportionate cost.

For our part, we believe that the best way to achieve nuclear disarmament is through balanced and verifiable multilateral and bilateral agreements.

Falkland Islands (Prospecting)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have received from the Government of Argentina concerning the decision to grant a prospecting licence in the Falkland Islands to the First Land Oil and Gas Corporation.

Mr. Renton: None: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 17 January, at column 210. We have now set out our position on Falklands oil exploration in a letter from our permanent representative in New York to the United Nations Secretary-General. This has been circulated as a United Nations General Assembly document, copies of which are being placed in the Library of the House.

Non-prolefiration Treaty Review Conference

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his Department's policy towards the current applications by Greenpeace and Friends of the Earth to obtain observer status at the 1985 non-proliferation treaty (NPT) review conference.

Mr. Luce: Rule 44 of the draft rules of procedure agreed by the preparatory committee for the conference would permit such organisations to attend meetings of the plenary and of the main committees as observers, and to receive the documents of the conference.

Diplomatic Relations

Mr. Mark Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the states with which the United Kingdom now has diplomatic relations.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom has diplomatic relations with the following states:

The Democratic Republic of Afghanistan.
The Democratic Popular Republic of Algeria.
The People's Republic of Angola.
Antigua and Barbuda.
The Commonwealth of Australia.
The Republic of Austria.
The Commonwealth of the Bahamas.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Andrew Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community Council of Ministers.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The usual written forecast was deposited in the House earlier today. At present four meetings of the Council of Ministers are planned for February.

The Internal Market and Consumer Affairs Council is due to meet on 11 February to discuss product liability; the draft directive on the co-ordination of laws relating to self-employed commercial agents; the draft directive on doorstep selling; the draft directive on the right of establishment of architects; the draft 20th VAT directive on compensation for German farmers as agreed at Fontainebleau; and the proposal for tax reliefs for international travellers, for small private consignments and for fuel in tanks of commercial vehicles.

The Economic and Finance Council is expected to meet on 11 February to discuss the financial framework for measures to be financed from the guidance section of the European agricultural guarantee and guidance fund (FEOGA) over the years 1985-89.

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 18-19 February to prepare the Community position for negotiations with Spain and Portugal. It will continue its discussions of the new own resources decision and the financing of the 1985 budget; and of the 1985 food aid programme. Ministers may also consider a draft negotiating mandate for the second EC-Yugoslavia financial Protocol and may give further consideration to the question of integrated Mediterranean programmes (IMPS).

The Agricultural Council is expected to meet on 25-26 February to consider the Commission's price proposals for 1985; the reform of the wine regime, including structural measures; proposals on obligatory distillation and special measures for Greece in the light of the Dublin European Council conclusions; apd agricultural structures which involve aids for investment in agricultural holdings, measures for forestry and the protection of the environment. The administration of the milk supplementary levy may also be discussed.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

EC (Agricultural Expenditure)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what parts of EEC expenditure on agriculture do not come under the heading of market support expenditure; and what are the annual amounts spent on them.

Mr. MacGregor: In addition to expenditure on market support from the guarantee Section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund, payments for structural measures are made from the guidance section of the fund. There are also certain other items of agricultural expenditure such as Community contributions to animal health measures and agricultural research. Expenditure in 1984 is provisionally estimated at 650 mecu from the guidance section and 70 mecu for the other agricultural measures.

EC (Agricultural Prices)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the EEC Commission, in drawing up its proposals for agricultural prices in the light of the financial guideline, will estimate the quantity of agricultural production likely to be achieved; and if it will make at the same time proposals for preventing the total cost of agricultural support exceeding the maximum laid down in the financial guideline.

Mr. MacGregor: The Commission have yet to table its proposals for the 1985 price fixing and I cannot anticipate its judgment on how it will implement its undertaking to draw up its proposals in the light of the financial guideline.

EC Regulation (Conservation)

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) which member states have publicly indicated their support for the proposal from the United Kingdom Government for amendments to the proposed Agricultural Structures Regulation COM(83) 559, in favour of conservation; and what conditions have been attached to this support;

(2) which member states have indicated their opposition to the proposal from the United Kingdom Government for amendments to the proposed Agricultural Structures Regulation, COM (83) 559, in favour of conservation; and on what grounds such opposition has been raised.

Mr. Jopling: The United Kingdom's initiative has so far attracted neither outright opposition nor clear support. I believe this reflects the fact that we are among the leaders in recognising the importance of encouraging environmentally sound farming practices.

I shall continue to press our case at the next Council of Agriculture Ministers meeting on 25-26 February.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what monitoring activities are presently carried out on a regular basis by his Department of pesticide residues in food; and what resources have been devoted to these activities on an annual basis for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: The working party on pesticide residues which reports to the interdepartmental steering group on food surveillance, the advisory committee on pesticides and the veterinary products committee continuously monitors both home-produced and imported food for residues of pesticides. A report of its activities for the period 1977 to 1981 was published in 1982—the Ninth Report of the Steering Group on Food Surveillance, London, HMSO—and I expect a further comprehensive report of the more recent work proposed and co-ordinated by the working party to be published later this year. This will present inter alia the results of a three-year survey of residues of pesticides on United Kingdom and imported fruit and vegetables and of post-harvest fungicide treatments of cereals in store.

The estimated expenditure for the financial year April 1984 to March 1985 is £505,000, and the expenditure for the year April 1983 to March 1984 was £449,000.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make available in the Library the pesticide usage survey report, produced by his Department, for the latest available dates.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes. A copy has now been placed in the Library.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information is available, through his Department, of regional pesticide usage in agriculture in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: Pesticide usage surveys are designed to derive national figures on pesticide usage. Some of the reports give indications of differences in usage in different parts of the country which were surveyed. Copies of recent reports are being made available in the House Library.

Development and Research (Expenditure)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the annual expenditure devoted to development and research by his Department and the Agricultural Research Council, respectively, for each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will indicate for each year the percentage of resources devoted to crop protection.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

Expenditure on Research and Development in Agriculture, Fisheries and Food

	MAFF In-House £ million	AFRC (MAFF) (Vote) £ million	AFRC (Science) (Vote) £ million	Other Contractors £ million	Total R & D £ million	Crop Protection per cent.

Pests and Diseases (Control)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is aware of any experiments presently being conducted in the United Kingdom relating to measures designed for integrated control of pests and diseases in agriculture.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes. Amongst experiments presently being conducted in the United Kingdom are projects at the glasshouse crops research institute, Rothamsted experimental station, East Malling research station and at ADAS laboratories.

Herbicide 2,4,5-T

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the total amount of the herbicide 2,4,5-T used in Britain in each of the last five years in which records have been kept.

Mr. MacGregor: The most recent survey of total amounts of the herbicide 2,4,5-T used in the United Kingdom relates to the calendar year 1979. Full details were published in the December 1980 report of the advisory committee on pesticides, a copy of which is in the Library.

A survey of pesticide usage in agriculture and horticulture—including herbicides such as 2,4,5-T—is in progress. The results will be published in due course.

EC (Food Exports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why he has adopted the practice of placing details of European Economic Community food exports to the Soviet Union in the Library instead of in the Official Report; and if he will reconsider this decision.

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend is under a misapprehension. I answered his question on this matter on 14 January, at column 28, and published the information in the Official Report.

ENVIRONMENT

Regional Emergency Committee

84. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if regional emergency committees will meet between 26 February and 16 March.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are plans to hold meetings of the regional emergency committees between 26 February and 16 March.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what charges were brought and what convictions were secured against registered breeders of birds of prey in 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: No central record of the number of offences is available. Details of possible offences or irregularities which come to the Department's attention are referred to the police or other enforcement agencies. At least a dozen cases have, or will, come to court where the Department has provided information.

Rents Acts

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce in the current Session of Parliament legislation to amend the Rent Acts in relation to registered rents.

Mr. Gow: We introduced various measures to stimulate the provision of private rented accommodation in the Housing Act 1980. My right hon. Friend is considering what further steps could be taken to encourage landlords to meet the demand for homes to rent. However, he has no plans to introduce legislation on this subject in the current Session.

Thames Water Authority

Mr. Bendall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy that the external financing limit of the Thames water authority for the forthcoming financial year is set at such a level that the whole of the increase in revenues from the increase in financial target for the period is retained by the authority for use for the benefit of the customers of the authority.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. The Government's policy for all water authorities is that they should earn a reasonable return on their assets. External financing limits are then set having regard to investment needs.

Local Authorities (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the system of setting local authority permitted capital expenditure limits.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced arrangements for local authority capital expenditure in 1985-86 in a statement to the House on 18 December 1984, at columns 164-65. In doing so, he said that he would be consulting the local authority associations about possible changes to the system for the longer term. Those discussions are now in train.

London Planning Commission

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) on 16 November 1984, Official Report, column 378, what range of information, and on which topics, will be collected and analysed by the London Planning Commission in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I expect the London Planning Commission to be concerned with those topics upon which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will issue strategic guidance to help the London boroughs to prepare their unitary development plans. Such matters might include population trends and land for housing, provision for major industrial and commercial development, minerals planning and open space. The range of information to be considered will be commensurate with the commission's role.

GLC (Research Library's Database)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times his Department has used the Greater London council research library's Acompline online database; and what arrangements will be made to ensure that its users continue to receive this service in the event of the Greater London council's abolition.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

GLC (Housing Improvement Areas)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the London boroughs containing Greater London council housing improvement areas are designated authorities under the Rates Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: The following London boroughs, which are designated authorities for 1985-86 under the Rates Act 1984, also contain Greater London council housing action areas: Brent, Islington, Lambeth and Southwark.

Docklands (Public Investment)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much public investment in infrastructural works in Docklands had already taken place when the London Docklands Development Corporation became operational.

Sir George Young: This information was not collected for the UDC area prior to the formation of the London Docklands Development Corporation in July 1981. The Docklands joint committee did, however, carry out a number of infrastructure projects between 1974 and early 1981 in what is now the LDDC area, such as the consolidation of large areas of Surrey and London docks and the draining of Beckton marshes.

Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what meetings have taken place between civil servants in his Department and officers of London boroughs to co-ordinate requests under section 5(2) of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984; what boroughs were involved; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Housing Revenue Accounts

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were his reasons for setting the 1984-85 grant-related expenditure in respect of rate fund contributions to the housing revenue account to zero for those authorities found to have notional surpluses on their housing revenue accounts.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following strong representations from authorities when block grant was introduced in 1981-82, the then Secretary of State decided that it was not right to assume in the distribution of block grant for 1982-83 that authorities with the potential to make a surplus on their housing revenue accounts would actually make those surpluses and transfer them to the general rate fund. The same decision has been made in each subsequent settlement.

Voluntary Agencies (Support)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the deadline for responses to his consultation paper on support for the voluntary sector in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Sir George Young: While there is no set closing date for comments on this consultation paper, which was issued by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, anyone still wishing to offer comments should do so as soon as possible.

Rates (Cambridge University Study)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) on 7 March 1984, Official Report, column 605, on what date he received the report of the study commissioned by his Department from the University of Cambridge into the effect of rate levels upon employment; and when he expects to publish the report.

Mr. Waldegrave: The report of the Cambridge team was received in the Department of the Environment on Thursday 24 January 1985. It will be considered by the interdepartmental steering group for the project. Decisions on publication will then be taken in the normal way.

Public Building

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many permanent new buildings were started in the public sector during the last six months of 1984; and how this compares with the last six months of 1979.

Sir George Young: The information as requested is not available. The values of new orders received by contractors for public building and civil engineering work in Great Britain at 1980 prices were £1,770 million and £1,950 million respectively for the five months July to November 1979 and 1984. December information is not yet available for 1984.

"A Better Future for the Uplands"

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he can now respond to the Countryside Commission's report, "A Better Future for the Uplands."

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government have given careful consideration to the report and I have today sent the following letter to the chairman, Sir Derek Barber, which sets out the Government's views.

Dear Sir Derek

A BETTER FUTURE FOR THE UPLANDS

I must congratulate you first of all on an admirable report

—comprehensive, well researched, attractively produced, pertinent, and readable. I appreciate too the efforts you have made to command the co-operation and participation of all concerned with the wellbeing of the uplands. So my thanks to all those who made a contribution to the exercise.

The report has another salient virtue—it is focussed and practical. It shows concern for overall strategy, but recognises that we do not live in a world of ideal and immediate solutions.

In one sense, the timing of your report could not have been better. Change is in the air and that is clearly the moment to press forward with proposals and recommendations. But, in the shorter term, it poses a dilemma. We are considering a number of rural and agricultural measures but at this stage the exact outcome of various policy initiatives is still unclear. Many of the decisions to be taken could have considerable relevance for the uplands and conversely many of your proposals have implications for other rural areas.

Against this fluctuating background, what I propose to do at this stage is to respond to as many of your specific recommendations as present circumstances will allow, giving at the same time a broad indication of the government's overall thinking and attitudes on the issues before us. What I do not propose to do is to rehearse once again at length the facts, figures and conflicting arguments. This means that our response is not comprehensive nd has inevitably something of an interim flavour. This, however, has certain advantages. None of us—government, local authorities, the statutory agencies, the voluntary organsations—has ever been under any illusion that the future of the uplands could be settled by a single, once-for-all, package of decisions. With so many complex factors involved, progress cannot be other than evolutionary, taking account of new problems and new opportunities. The subject will continue to preoccupy us all. One thing is certain: thanks to your report, future decisions will be taken in the light of a thorough and up to date assessment of the issues.

We are certainly in agreement on the broad policy objectives, as set out in your first recommendation (paragraph 139). Sustaining vigorous upland communities and improving their quality of life economically and socially, while protecting and enhancing the wildlife, landscape and historic heritage of the uplands and ensuring accessibility to as many as possible, has our wholehearted commitment. I endorse them entirely. Whatever the faults and failures of the past, future decisions on the uplands must represent a careful reconciliation of social, economic and evironmental factors. Lopsided progress in one direction only, at the expense of other objectives, will not be acceptable.

Rural Development

Turning to specific matters, I will comment first on the subject of rural development. This is, of course, a broad concept which impinges on a variety of policies, and with which many different agencies are necessarily involved. The same objectives apply in England and in Wales: but the mechanisms differ. In England the Development Commission's Rural Development Areas, designated by using a mixture of social and economic criteria, have an important role. Rural Development Areas are given priority assistance by the Commission and most of the uplands are within them.

The Commission intends to establish within these areas Rural Development Programmes which will provide a more comprehensive and better co-ordinated approach to the full range of problems facing deprived rural areas than was in fact offered by the Action Plans which they will replace. These programmes — and the consultative procedures which produce them — will be of major importance in the task of attaining a proper balance of social, economic, environmental and recreational measures in the uplands. Developments in agriculture and in the use of farm resources for non-agricultural purposes will be a vital element here and, with this in mind, ADAS will play a full part in the Rural Development Programme process. At the same time, there is no intention that Rural Development Programmes should replace structure and local plans drawn up by local authorities and other bodies.

In Wales, where 40 per cent. of the uplands of the two countries are found, the Secretary of State for Wales plays a central co-ordinating role in the stimulation of rural development, in the light of the extensive nature of his ministerial responsibilities—the economy, agriculture, the environment, planning, transport, housing and many other matters. He encourages active cooperation between the various organisations in the field.

A leading role is also played by two bodies—the Welsh Development Agency (WDA) and Mid Wales Development (MWD). Both bodies offer a wide range of measures to foster suitable projects in upland areas—factory sites, including workshops specifically designed for craft industries, grants for the conversion of redundant buildings and business advice for new and existing firms. WDA, in addition, offers throughout Wales a useful package of investment schemes, including special rural loans. With its interest in social as well as economic needs, MWD can also help with the provision of housing, shopping, cultural, leisure and social facilities, tourist developments and transport. Both bodies are continually seeking to develop new initiatives which will benefit the rural economy.

On the question of finance, I do not think it would be wise to earmark certain proportions of the funds of the development and tourist agencies for uplands work. That, I believe, would be too inflexible. I consider therefore that it must remain the task of the individual organisation to assess the competing needs and priorities and to allocate its funds accordingly. I would not wish to alter this arrangement. It is an indication of the priority we give to their work that the general level of funding for the development and tourist agencies has been shielded from reductions in public expenditure.

Furthermore funding activities of the Manpower Services Commission in upland areas are perhaps not as fully appreciated as they might be. Their Community Programme is already making a valuable contribution, with £2¼ million already committed to projects in upland areas since its introduction in October 1982. This and the Voluntary Projects Programme, recently extended to March 1986, could provide funds for further work in the uplands, although it must be admitted that competition for the available resources is intense.

Agriculture

A healthy and profitable agricultural sector is undoubtedly vital to the maintenance of the upland economy and the conservation of the upland landscape. The government accepts that a case exists for looking more closely at some aspects of the way in which support is given to upland farming and we have already adopted the principle that enhanced rates of capital grants should be used to encourage agricultural development sympathetic to the environment. To this end, the farm capital grant schemes now provide for a higher rate of grant for hedges and shelter belts as well as for walls and dykes built of traditional local materials rather than fencing. This is another step towards achieving a closer integration of conservation and agricultural policies; it is intended to develop the concept further.

In addition, the government is pressing in Brussels for an amendment to the draft EC structures regulation designed to enable member states to encourage, in environmentally sensitive areas, farming practices consonant with conservation of the environment. It is in any event our intention to introduce further measures to help conservation in the UK.

Small or part-time farmers can clearly play a positive role in the economy of rural communities in the uplands. The European Community's new measures to improve agricultural structures are likely to change the conditions of eligibility for capital grants to the advantage of such farmers, although it has not yet been decided precisely how the new Structures Regulation will be implemented in the United Kingdom. We recognise that the Countryside Commission is in a position to contribute to the formulation of farm structures policy and in due course we shall be seeking your advice, as well as that of other relevant statutory agencies, on the implementation in the UK of the new structural measures.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances represent a major part of hill farming net incomes and so are an important factor in maintaining farming communities in these areas. This year support is being extended for the first time to the newly designated less favoured areas though at lower rates than the originally designated hill areas.

Diversification

The government agrees with the Commission that there is considerable potential for business diversification by farmers in some areas and that socio-economic advice provided by ADAS has an important role in developing this.

ADAS operates a three-tier service in this field. Regional Socio-Economic Advisers are backed up by approximately 70 Special Interest Advisers stationed at divisional and area offices. The majority of front line advisers can also draw on a wealth of experience which enables them to give advice on many socio-economic matters, for example, regarding family farms and links with other organisations with rural interests. This expertise is readily available and farmers can draw on it heavily as and when they need it. But it is vital in this type of work to go at the pace the farming industry both wants and can assimilate at any one time. Accordingly, the supply and demand situation concerning this sort of advice is being kept under constant review. The recent review of ADAS stressed the role of conservation and socio-economic advice.

ADAS is encouraging the trend towards diversification in line with the duty placed upon the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in the Wildlife and Countryside Act (Section 41). Current and future initiatives include enterprise groups in Wales, involvement with the Development Commission over Rural Development Programmes, meetings and seminars with both county and district local authorities, and finally a series of ADAS-organised meetings on diversification being held in England and Wales this winter and involving farmers, landlords, local authorities, the tourist boards and COSIRA.

I note your criticism of our decision not to implement the provisions in the LFA Directive which allows grant to be paid to farmers for small-scale tourist and craft enterprises. The conditions attached to these provisions, together with stringent restrictions on the amount of expenditure on tourism and craft projects eligible for aid, have so limited the scope of the measure that the government has not considered it worthwhile. However, as the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced on 11 December, when the new capital grants schemes are introduced in 1985 to implement the new EC farm structure policy, it is the government's intention to introduce further measures to encourage farmers to diversify into non-farming enterprises—aids to tourist and craft enterprises being obvious candidates.

Conservation of the Countryside

Conservation of the countryside is an objective to which this government is wholeheartedly committed. A whole series of decisions since 1979 have reflected the high priority which we attach to it. Most recently, our decision to step up the funding of both the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council, at a time when retrenchment is the order of the day, provides further evidence of our determination to maintain the pace of achievement in this area. The Wildlife and Countryside Act marked a significant advance and we are pledged to the closing of the three-month SSSI loophole. We have also sought to ensure that agricultural policies, particularly on farm capital grants, take proper account of the requirements of conservation, and when the grant schemes were amended both in 1983 and 1984, we grasped the opportunity to make modifications in the interests of conservation. I believe that our record in this area is first-class and we intend to build further on what has already been achieved.

We recognise that livestocking practices in the uplands might conflict with conservation objectives in certain circumstances, but there is no evidence of a general problem of overstocking, against which there are in any case already powerful safeguards. The statutory rules provide that HLCAs are not payable on animals in excess of the numbers the land can carry without overgrazing. ADAS look into any cases of localised overstocking and will recommend reductions in payments where appropriate. More generally, there are overall financial and numerical limits of £60 and 6 sheep per hectare in severely disadvantaged areas and £45 and 9 sheep in disadvantaged areas.

Conservation of moorland presents particular problems because much of it depends on agricultural use for its upkeep. We did, of course, in December 1984 withdraw grant aid for land reclamation throughout Great Britain. I am not, however, convinced that the further measures you propose—which we have considered most carefully—would necessarily be more effective than the existing procedure. On the one hand, while blanket withdrawals of grant would be unfair to the individual farmer, land improvement which would be beneficial to conservation would also be excluded. In particular, withdrawal of drainage and the range of land improvement grants from section 43 areas would be an unnecessarily severe step which would deny aid to very many farmers who need these grants to sustain the viability of their farms and who are able to carry out these operations without harm to the landscape. Nevertheless I believe it would be a mistake to regard the matter as closed. I therefore propose, with your assistance, to keep the subject under review in the light of futher experience with the working of the Wildlife and Countryside Act. This process will be helped, I believe, by the review of Section 43 maps which I understand you are putting in hand at our suggestion.

I also have little doubt that local planning authorities would not welcome the extra burden on their resources implied by your proposals to amend planning controls on farming and forestry. In reaching these conclusions, I have been influenced—and impressed — by Dr. Brotherton's figures for the grant notification arrangements in National Parks in the first six months following implementation of Section 41; out of 2,757 cases, only 6 had not been resolved locally. The second six months gives similar results.

We have given the most careful consideration to the related suggestion that the exemption currently given to certain farm buildings and farm and forest roads under the General Development Order should be withdrawn throughout the LFAs. We are not, however, convinced that the scale of the landscape problems arising from construction of new farm buildings and roads is sufficient to warrant what would amount to a considerable extension of planning control when we strive to avoid such extensions unless there is very clear justification for them.

I can, however, report a modest but significant step forward which we intend to take immediately. We accept that in National Parks there is a case for a system of improved control over the siting and design of farm building and farm and forest roads, provided this can be done without undue cost for local authorities and disruption for the farming community. I have therefore decided to issue a consultation paper proposing that a new LASDO be made covering the design and siting of all farm buildings and farm and forest roads in all National Parks. This will enable the arguments for and against to be exhaustively examined. A change in this direction was recommended, as you will know, by the 1974 report of the National Parks Policies Review Committee. No action was taken because the National Parks Authorities had no power to make discretionary grants to meet the additional costs incurred in meeting more stringent design standards. They now have such a power, thanks to Section 44 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act which this government included to allow change of the kind we now contemplate to operate fairly. As with conservation areas and listed buildings, we do not believe that there should be an automatic right to compensation if conditions on siting or construction details are imposed, but we do believe that discretionary grants under Section 44 should be available. Steps would need to be taken to avoid duplication of work in cases where grant is claimed; but this requires administrative rather than legislative action.

Forestry

We cannot accept that a case has yet been made that planning controls should be introduced over forestry. Timber production has both balance of payments and, to some extent, strategic implications and contributes to the social fabric of the uplands. Ways of reconciling forestry, conservation and amenity must, however, be seen to be effective if public support for forestry is to continue.

Forestry Commission planting policies have been criticised in some quarters as insensitive, but the consultation procedures for forestry grants and felling permissions introduced some years ago, and only recently revised, have shown that acceptable solutions to land-use problems in this area can be found by a relatively informal approach. A key role in this process is performed by the Regional Advisory Committees composed of members with expertise in agriculture, planning and environment as well as forestry matters. To meet the concern that the Committee's proceedings are not as open as the equivalent planning process, the Forestry Commission is currently looking at ways of achieving greater public accountability.

Woodlands

We share your concern for native woodlands in the uplands and support the provision of advice and encouragement for woodland management in the interests of timber, conservation and shelter. Such advice and encouragement are already provided by ADAS, the Forestry Commission, numerous County Councils and private consultants in regard to farm woodlands and a Forestry Commission working group has recently reviewed the state of broadleaves in Britain as a whole. The Commission will be making recommendations to Ministers in due course and some of these will be relevant to the uplands. The government are also considering the extent to which farm woodlands might be encouraged as a means of diversifying the farm business.

As regards the possible inclusion of enclosed broadleaf woodlands in the HLCA calculations, present Community legislation does not provide for land which is not part of the forage area to be included in the calculation of a farm's financial ceiling for the HLCA payments. However, once the new Agricultural Structures regulation is adopted, the government will consider whether there is any scope for certain areas of woodland to be taken into account.

Minerals

We have repeatedly made it clear that consideration of environmental impact must be an integral part of the planning process both when structure and local plans are being drawn up and when specific applications are being considered. In sensitive areas, all possible alternatives, and measures to minimise harmful effects, need to be looked at even more carefully than elsewhere. But bearing in mind the trend of diversification away from agriculture and the simple geological fact that certain types and qualities of minerals are concentrated in the uplands, I am inclined to the view that your report possibly underplays the benefits and importance (not least to employment) of their extraction in suitable — and carefully controlled — circumstances. The gains cannot be lightly dismissed and it should never be forgotten that they have been achieved for a generation within a planning system that has provided a whole battery of safeguards. It is the government's continuing commitment that applications for new mineral workings and extensions to existing workings should be subject to the most rigorous examination, especially in national parks.

Public Access

Your report contained several recommendations about the important issue of public access in the uplands. We appreciate the concern both about the need for access and the problems which can be associated with increasing numbers of visitors in the uplands. We believe that the best way to handle both concerns is by leaving them in the hands of the National Park Authorities and the local authorities on the basis of their existing powers. In this context the Secretary of State for Wales and I were pleased to be able to announce an increase in the level of National Park supplementary grant for 1985-86 somewhat in excess of the rate of inflation.

Many aspects of access to the countryside are, of course, currently being examined in a research study sponsored by the Countryside Commission and the Sports Council and due to be completed this year. We will look again at access policies when we have the Countryside Commission's review based on the findings of the study. You recommend that existing access arrangements on Forestry Commission forest lands be protected when sold to the private sector. This raises legal problems and a voluntary code of practice by the private sector might be a more sensible solution. The research may help here, too.

As regards the outstanding recommendations of the Royal Commission on Common Land, the government has already made it clear that it favours further legislation in due course. We welcomed the Countryside Commission's initiative a year ago in establishing a Common Land Forum to discuss and agree recommendations for such further legislation and we look forward to receiving the Commission's recommendations based on the Forum's conclusions.

Housing

You argue in favour of higher Housing Investment Programme allocations for district councils with large rural areas in order to meet the special housing needs of the uplands. I think it can reasonably be argued that, by and large, the system already reflects, and caters for, those special needs, within, of course, the usual limitations imposed by the need for public expenditure restraint. There are two main components in the Housing Investment Programme system in England. One is an objective assessment of housing needs (the Generalised Needs Index) based on specific indicators like stock conditions; the other is the Local Discretionary Element under which the particular circumstances of individual local authorities are taken into account and reflected in allocations. If an authority argues that it has a special need in relation to housing in upland areas, this would be taken into account. In Wales, the methodology is slightly different, but the principle is the same. It is a cardinal feature of both systems that once the broad allocations are made, it is for the local authorities themselves to decide how they are used. The consultations on Rural Development Programmes could provide an obvious opportunity to discuss at local level the housing needs of such areas.

As a contribution towards the needs of young workers setting up home for the first time, the Development Commission and the Housing Corporation are currently engaged in a pilot project to provide up to 100 dwellings in rural areas on shared ownership terms. The Commission is contributing £5,000 towards each unit. 85 have been approved so far and some of these will be in upland areas. A modified follow-up scheme has been recently announced and its results will be carefully monitored. It is hoped local authorities will benefit from the experience gained and follow the lead given.

Health and Social Service

The government believes that the organisation of health and personal social services is best determined in the light of local circumstances and local needs. It accepts that people living in remote areas have a need equal with those in urban centres for advice and information on health, social service and social security matters.

Education

The concern felt about village school closures is very natural, but the objective for education in rural areas must be as far as possible to provide children with the same educational opportunities as pupils of their own age in towns and cities. This inevitably involves local education authorities in a selective programme of closures to secure the best use of available resources and to avoid, wherever possible, the diminished opportunities that can occur in schools that are too small. The new Education Support Grants being introduced in 1985 have been offered to six authorities for pilot projects aimed at improving the education experience in small schools. The Secretary of State for Education and Science in England and the Secretary of State for Wales, as appropriate, consider all proposeals for school closures on their individual merits; an important factor in their decision is the difficulty of the journey that would be involved for pupils travelling to alternative schools.

Transport

Particular attention is paid to rural services in the recently published White Paper Buses (Cmnd 9300), which expresses the Government's concern at the decline of bus services in sparsely populated areas. I cannot do better than quote paragraph 3.11 of the White Paper:

> "The Government proposes supplementary measures to help county councils to modernise and improve rural transport services and will be monitoring their effects in the context of deregulation. First, innovation must be encouraged. A new grant will be created to encourage new transport schemes for communities in rural areas. In England, the grant will be for up to £1 million a year, administered by the Development Commission. Similar arrangements will be made for Scotland and Wales. Second, competitive tendering will help authorities to achieve much better value for money for the service they decide to support. But the full benefits of tendering will not be felt immediately. So, third, the Government will make available additional help to maintain vital rural services in this transitional period. This will take the form of a special grant available for 4 years and paid direct to operators of eligible services in rural areas. The total value of the grant will be up to £20m in the first full year reducing by even steps in subsequent years."

Of the unconventional services available, post buses have already proved themselves of value in providing transport in upland areas of Scotland and may have great potential in England and Wales. The proposal made in the White Paper to permit more widespread operation of shared taxi and hire car services could also make a substantial contribution to transport services in the uplands.

Policy Coordination

It is worth mentioning that at local level the development plan process provides a ready made framework for a comprehensive and integrated approach to rural land use, including that in the uplands. The plan making process includes extensive consultation with Government Departments, agencies and other bodies and public participation is an important aspect.

In Wales a wide range of Ministerial responsibilities including Agriculture, Economic Development, the Environment, Planning, Transport and Housing, among others, rests with my colleague the Secretary of State for Wales. He encourages the agencies to work together and with local authorities in collaborative ventures and is well placed to ensure that policies are effectively coordinated.

Here at the centre I and my colleagues keep our policies in step. When government policy affects so many aspects of life, however, it is a continuing and difficult task to establish the right balance. When circumstances change quickly, perhaps accelerated by technological advances, contradictions and inconsistencies may arise. These must be corrected but without overreaction—the effect of which would produce a constant seesaw in government policy. I can assure you that our efforts in the uplands will be to achieve a sensible balance and a sensible solution to the problems which you have identified and in particular we shall be aiming to integrate our conservation and agricultural policies.

I agree, therefore, that policy towards the uplands needs careful coordination and a clear sense of our objectives so that we do not lose these vulnerable landscapes and their supporting populations through a lack of perception of their overriding needs. We are aware of the different objectives and we shall measure our policies against them. Nevertheless it is important that policy in the uplands should fit within a national framework. It would be unrealistic to expect that the future of our uplands could be settled in isolation. I think it is also unrealistic to expect the Less Favoured Areas directive to deal with all the problems of rural development (as you recommend in paragraph 190). Rural conditions vary considerably within the United Kingdom, even more so throughout the EEC. What we can do is to attempt to harmonise the measures we make available and leave it to the local authorities and other agencies at the local level to implement them according to local needs as they perceive them. This is consistent with the best traditions of democracy and decentralised decision making.

The question of parliamentary scrutiny is of course a matter for the appropriate Select Committees but nonetheless I assume they would find it necessary to relate policies towards the uplands to the national context.

On the question of flexibility in the operation of policies, I would hope that it would be possible to give sympathetic consideration to the sort of joint official projects you have in mind. Perhaps it would be best to look at these case by case.

Conclusion

The report A Better Future for the Uplands identifies very clearly the main issues facing the uplands of England and Wales and provides an invaluable guide to the thinking of the Commission and the other organisations involved. As this letter indicates, it has already influenced Government thinking on these problems and it will undoubtedly continue to do so.

It is, in a word, a milestone, but a milestone on a road which stretches far ahead. This letter, as I have already emphasised, is by no means the end of the story as far as policies for the uplands are concerned. At the same time, I very much hope that what I have said, and the decisions I have indicated, make it abundantly clear that the government's approach to these problems is positive and constructive. There are a number of key themes in policies for the uplands and I have touched on them throughout this letter. We accept the need for a prosperous agricultural industry which can and does make a major contribution to a thriving rural sector and the conservation of the countryside. We welcome the increasing awareness of the importance of conservation, and the extent to which the voluntary principle is accepted. National policies must set the framework but within that there is considerable scope for local initiative and contributions from non-governmental bodies.

Indeed, if there is one theme which I would particularly like to emphasise in conclusion, it is that a brighter future for the uplands will be achieved, not by government decisions alone, but by the strenuous and purposeful exertions of the many different organisations and individuals involved, working to mutually agreed objectives. I believe that this cooperative approach, already strongly in evidence, will accomplish a great deal and we shall play our full part in it.

I am copying this letter to the Chairmen of the Development Board for Rural Wales, the Development Commission, the English Tourist Board, and the Wales Tourist Board."

WILLIAM WALDEGRAVE

PRIME MINISTER

Markyate, Hertfordshire

Q28. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Markyate, Hertfordshire.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Coal Industry Dispute

Q69. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Prime Minister if she will now consider the representation of the Welsh Churches organisations supported by the south Wales National Union of Mineworkers and the National Union of Mineworkers nationally, to attempt to prepare a basis for immediate negotiations with the National Coal Board to resolve the mining dispute.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy met the leaders of both the British Council of Churches and the Council of Churches for Wales last week. I share the concern expressed by the Churches about the damage this pointless dispute is inflicting on the mining industry and its communities. Like them, I also wish for a swift, constructive settlement. But any settlement must offer the industry a viable future.

Capital Funds

Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she will now take steps to control the movement of capital funds out of the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: No.

Engagements

Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 31 January.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Regional Development Grants (Wales)

Mr. Anderson asked the Prime Minister why she has transferred to the Welsh Office responsibility for the administration of all regional development grants in Wales.

The Prime Minister: Regional development grants, in the form introduced by the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act 1984, will, for the future, be most sensibly administered together with regional selective assistance. Both forms of assistance are on a project basis and normally linked to jobs. A consistent approach towards projects in receipt of both forms of assistance is needed. Therefore, the payment of regional development grants in Wales has, since 29 November 1984, been the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Wales, who was already responsible for payments under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982. Similar arrangements have been made in Scotland.

Milk Production

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what is the Government's reason for providing compensation to dairy farmers for reducing the amount of over-production of milk.

The Prime Minister: The purpose of the outgoers scheme is to obtain quota for reallocation to those producers who are most disadvantaged by the introduction of milk quotas, in particular small producers and exceptional hardship cases. To make this possible, payments are offered to farmers who are willing to give up milk production and surrender their quotas.

Agriculture (Competitiveness)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether it is the Government's policy to make agriculture fully competitive with imports from all sources.

The Prime Minister: Price levels for agricultural products in the United Kingdom are largely determined by the mechanisms of the common agricultural policy. It is Government policy to help the industry remain competitive.

Agriculture (Hills and Marginal Areas)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what are the reasons for the Government's support for agriculture in the hills and other marginal areas.

The Prime Minister: This support makes a major contribution to the rural economy, to the maintenance of the environment and to our competitive relations with other European Community member countries.

Water Industry (Privatisation)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Prime Minister if she will consider proposals for the privatisation of the water industry.

The Prime Minister: The Government would welcome new ideas on privatisation. However, the water authorities are natural monopolies for many of their functions and we need to be particularly careful when considering replacing a public monopoly by a private one. Because of the environmental and public health responsibilities, any proposal to privatise them would also raise issues of regulation. There are 30 private water companies which are concerned only with water supply and which are mainly regulated by statute.

Falkland Islands (Oil Drilling Rights)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what representations Her Majesty's Government have received with regard to the granting of a licence to Firstland Oil plc for drilling rights on the Falklands.

The Prime Minister: None.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister whether any conditions regarding the use of the use of profits arising as a result of onshore oil exploration in the Falklands were imposed in the licence granted to Firstland Oil plc.

The Prime Minister: In accordance with the Falkland Islands Mining (Mineral Oil) Regulations 1964, the licence provides for royalties to be paid to the Falkland Islands Government on any oil or gas extracted. It also provides that an annual rent will be paid to the Falkland Islands Government.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her discussions with Mr. Perez de Cuellar on 23 January about the Falkland Islands.

The Prime Minister: Details of my discussions with Mr. Perez de Cuellar must remain confidential.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the steps taken to encourage re-investment of profits in the Falklands.

The Prime Minister: Yes. The aim of the Falkland Islands Development Corporation is to encourage investment in the development and diversification of the local economy, including reinvestment of funds generated in the Islands. We hope that the opening of a branch of Standard Chartered bank in Stanley in January 1984 will assist the same objective.

VE Day (40th Anniversary)

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if any steps are to be taken by the British embassy in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to mark the 40th anniversary of the end of the war against Nazi Germany; whether it is intended to mark the occasion in Moscow jointly with representatives of the Soviet authorities; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Our embassy in Moscow, together with those of our partners and allies, is continuing to monitor closely Soviet preparations for the commemoration of the end of the last war in Europe. If, in due course, the Soviet Union were formally to invite the United Kingdom to participate in the commemorative events in Moscow the invitation would be studied carefully and a reply given after consultation with our allies.

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if the Government intend to invite representatives of the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and France to a gathering in the United Kingdom to mark the 40th anniversary of the end of the war against Nazi Germany; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) on 15 January at column 180 and to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) on 17 January at column 505. I expect both our wartime and our present allies to be represented.

Zeus Security Consultants

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister which Government Departments have placed contracts in the past year with Zeus Security Consultants.

The Prime Minister: Information of this kind is not held centrally, but I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend, the Minister of State, Treasury, on 28 January at column 17.

Chile

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister why the United Kingdom abstained on resolutions at the United Nations General Assembly criticising the human rights situation in Chile in 1982 and 1983; and if she will place copies of those resolutions in the Library.

The Prime Minister: In 1982 we voted in the third committee in favour of the Chile resolution. We later abstained in the plenary because we believed the resolution to have been unbalanced by a subsequent amendment. We stressed in our explanation of vote that this abstention did not reflect any lessening in our concerns over the human rights situation in Chile. In 1983 we again abstained because we judged the Chile resolution lacked balance but in our explanation of vote repeated our concern over human rights. The resolutions and our explanation of vote are already in the Library of the House.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister why the United Kingdom abstained on the 1981 resolution at the Commission of Human Rights criticising human rights in Chile; and if she will place a copy of the resolution in the Library.

The Prime Minister: We abstained because we judged the resolution unbalanced. In a separate paragraph vote we supported the renewal of the mandate of the special rapporteur for Chile. Both the resolution and our explanation of vote are already in the Library of the House.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her reply about the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) on 13 December, Official Report, column 1204, if she will publish in the Official Report her letter on this matter to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, dated 23 January.

The Prime Minister: Yes. The letter is as follows:

"Thank you for your letter of 27 December about the reply I gave to Tony Lloyd in the House on 13 December about the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act. I am grateful for this opportunity to clarify the position.

Where a local authority is satisfied of an individual disabled person's need for one of the services listed in Section 2 of the Act, it has a duty to make arrangements to meet that need. In that sense this part of the Act is certainly mandatory. However, it is for the local authority itself to assess need and to detemine how it should best be met. To that extent there is also an element of discretion.

You can rest assured that it was not my intention in any way to question the statutory duties imposed by the Act on local authorities, nor to indicate any change in the advice given to successive Ministers for the Disabled on this point. I am sorry if the wording of my reply suggested otherwise."

VJ Day (40th Anniversary)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what official arrangements are being made to mark the 40th anniversary of victory over Japan day; and whether, among other organisations, the National Federation of Far Eastern Prisoners of War Clubs and Associations and the Burma Star Association are being fully consulted about the arrangements.

The Prime Minister: I said in the House on 17 January at column 504, that we shall remember both VE day and VJ day in our commemoration. The format is being considered and we shall make an announcement in due course. We are already aware of the views of a range of associations. As our planning progresses we shall consult further with relevant associations through the good offices of the Royal British Legion.

Flight Lieut. Richard Thomas

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister why Flight Lieut. Richard Thomas was on loan to the Chilean air force; and whether any other military personnel have been on loan to the Chilean military since January 1982.

The Prime Minister: Flight Lieut. Thomas was on loan to the Chilean air force to assist with flying training on Hunter aircraft. No more than two British military personnel have been on loan to Chile at any one time since January 1982; all have been RAF instructors.

Chile (Uranium Supplies)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she has offered to supply, or authorised the supply of, enriched uranium to the Chilean Government; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy in a written answer on 6 December 1982 at column 344 to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Deliveries under the contract referred to in this reply were completed in early 1984. No further requests for the supply of enriched uranium have been received from the Chilean Government.

We are aware that the Chilean Government are considering refurbishment of a research reactor not currently in commission. If they were to offer the United Kingdom a contract for fuel supply we would consider an export licence application in the light of the policy set out in the answer that I gave to the hon. Member on 28 January at columns 24-25.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government to the transfer of enriched uranium to Chile.

The Prime Minister: Any transfer of enriched uranium to Chile would be dealt with on a case-by-case basis, but the Government's general policy on the transfer of enriched uranium to Chile falls within the guidelines set out in the answer that I gave to the hon. Member on 28 January at columns 24-25.

DEFENCE

Merchant Marine (Research Projects and Studies)

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the research projects and studies on merchant marine issues which are currently under commission by his Department, their purpose, the organisations which are carrying out the work, and the costs.

Mr. Stanley: The Ministry of Defence and the Department of Transport are undertaking a joint study into the future availability of merchant shipping for defence purposes. As part of that study the Department of Transport has commissioned SEA Group consultants to forecast future trends of availability in certain categories of merchant shipping. The cost of the consultants' study is a matter for the Department of Transport. There are no other research projects or studies currently under commission to outside bodies or consultants.

Type 22 Frigate

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will define the expression "other relevant factors", as used in his answer of Friday 18 January, that are to be taken into account before the decision is made as to the placement of the two type 22 warships; and what is the weight that is being given to social and commercial factors, respectively, in coming to a decision.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 28 January at column 21.

MCV 80 Project

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the MCV 80 project.

Mr. Butler: I am happy to say that progress on this important project continues to be very satisfactory. Main development of the MCV 80 infantry section vehicle was successfully completed towards the end of last year and the prime contractor, GKN Sankey, is pressing ahead with the development of variant vehicles for the infantry command, repair and recovery, and artillery observation roles. Following the decisions on competitive procurement arrangements, which were announced on 23 January last year, at column 400, by my predecessor, my hon. Friend the member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie), tenders have been invited from GKN Sankey and from three other potential manufacturers, and a contract has been placed for long lead items for initial production.

Greenham Common

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Defence if nuclear biological and chemical defence equipment is stored on the United States air force base at Greenham common

Mr. Stanley: As far as offensive equipment is concerned (a) Greenham common is a base for ground-launched cruise missiles; (b) there are no stocks of chemical weapons at United States bases in Great Britain; (c) there is no question of biological weapons being held at Greenham common because the United Kingdom and the USA observe the 1972 biological weapons convention which bans the development, possession and stockpiling of biological weapons.

As far as defensive NBC protective equipment is concerned, I cannot for security reasons indicate at which specific locations such equipment is held.

RAF Chilwell

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the date on which the memorandum of understanding between his Department and the United States authorities regarding RAF Chilwell was signed.

Mr. Lee: RAF Chilwell was formally made available to the United States Air Force on 9 May 1984 under the terms agreed in an exchange of letters.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the use to be made of facilities at Chilwell by the United States air force will include support for the 501st Tactical Missile Wing.

Mr. Lee: The vehicles stored by the United States air force are general support vehicles, such as fuel bowsers and tractors; none is earmaked for use by the 501st Tactical Missile Wing.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilian jobs will be created as a result of the acquisiton by the United States air force of facilities at RAF Chilwell.

Mr. Lee: It is too early to say.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether vehicles stationed at RAF Chilwell by the United States air force will be required to take part in dispersal exercises.

Mr. Lee: No.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many United States personnel will be stationed at RAF Chilwell; and whether there will be any personnel accommodated in the area.

Mr. Lee: There are no plans to station American personnel at RAF Chilwell, and therefore no plans to provide housing for them in the area.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether RAF Chilwell will host United States air force personnel and equipment in 1985.

Mr. Lee: General support vehicles are already stored at RAF Chilwell. They are at present maintained periodically by visiting USAF personnel from other bases.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement compatible with the interests of national security regarding the function of RAF Chilwell.

Mr. Lee: The facilities at RAF Chilwell are to be made available to the USAF for the storage of general support vehicles such as fuel bowsers and tractors.

Army Road Block, Westdown Camp

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the purpose of the army road blocks in the vicinity of Westdown camp, near Tilshead, on 11 December 1984; how many cars were stopped; on whose authority; with what results; and why cars of Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament members were not allowed to proceed.

Mr. Lee: A number of roads on the Salisbury plain training area were closed on 11 December, in accordance with the provisions of the relevant byelaws, while military exercises took place. Traffic control points were also set up on some public roads, in liaison with the civil police, in order to control the flow of military exercise traffic crossing roads at designated points. No records were kept of cars which were affected by these measures.

RNAD Broughton Moor

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there have been any changes in the operational arrangements for RNAD Broughton Moor.

Mr. Lee: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the operational role of RNAD Broughton Moor.

Mr. Lee: The store and issue of ammunition for use by NATO maritime forces.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any increase in the last 12 months in the number of persons employed at RNAD Broughton Moor.

Mr. Lee: No.

Falklands Campaign (Captured Weapons)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the use by Her Majesty's forces of 35 mm Oerlikon guns captured from Argentina during the Falklands campaign.

Mr. Stanley: Twin 35 mm Oerlikon guns with their associated Skyguard fire control system, captured during the Falklands campaign, will enter service with the Royal Auxiliary Air Force in a squadron due to form at RAF Waddington on 1 April 1985.

WINTEX '85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence which North Atlantic Treaty Organisation commands will be involved in the WINTEX '85 exercise.

Mr. Stanley: All major NATO commands, major subordinate commands and principal subordinate commands will take part in the exercise.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Exceptional Heating Allowance

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has now approved an exceptional heating allowance to persons in receipt of supplementary benefits to ameliorate the effects of the severe weather in Northern Ireland; what criteria are used to determine when such an allowance is paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Remanded Persons

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average period of remand without bail in each of the following cases involving accomplice witness's evidence or (a) persons convicted, (b) persons acquitted and (c) persons who were released as a result of such evidence being retracted; and how these figures compared with those for persons charged with scheduled offences on the basis of evidence other than accomplice evidence.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 71]: Information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at dispoportionate cost.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Prescriptions

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest estimate of the number of prescription items per capita in the United States of America, Italy, West Germany, France, Spain, New Zealand, Australia and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Although not official figures, recent commercial surveys suggest that the number of prescription items per capita in these countries is as follows:

	Number
Italy	11·3
West Germany	11·2
France	10·0
Spain	9·6
New Zealand	8·5
Australia	7·7
United Kingdom	6·6

No reliable figures are available for the United States of America.

This is a carefully selected list, as there are also developed countries with lower prescribing levels than the United Kingdom. These statistics are not very useful or relevant to current policy issues as prescribing figures for different countries can be influenced by many factors, in particular the vastly different eligibility rules and public subsidy arrngements within the various national health and insurance systems.

In those countries with apparently higher prescribing levels than in the United Kingdom, their Governments are taking steps to reduce this expenditure.

In the United Kingdom the medical profession itself accepts that current levels could be reduced and agreed some time ago to co-operate with the Government in encouraging more rational and economic prescribing.

Whooping Cough Vaccine

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any children whose death has been officially recorded as a cot death had been known to be in receipt of whooping cough vaccine 48 hours beforehand.

Mr. John Patten: Since 1964 there have been 13 yellow card reports of sudden infant deaths where combined diphtheria, tetanus and pertussis vaccine had been given during the previous 48 hours. The receipt of a report does not necessarily imply a causal relationship between the vaccination and the sudden infant death.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many High Court writs have been received by his Department served by, or on behalf of, those suffering brain damage as a result of whooping cough vaccine.

Mr. John Patten: There have been eight such cases.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends amending the whooping cough advice pamphlet issued by the Health Education Council in the light of the recently published statistic that one in 20,411 vaccinated against the disease has suffered brain damage and not one in 100,000 as at present stated in the pamphlet.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to ask the Health Education Council to revise its leaflet. I would refer the hon. Member to my right hon. and learned Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) on 31 July 1984 at columns 243-44. We are not aware of data since then which invalidate that advice.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in discovering an alternative whooping cough vaccine for which the necessary research funds have been provided.

Mr. John Patten: Research on the development of an alternative whooping cough vaccine at the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research, Porton Down, is making good progrees. Arrangements for the production of the vaccine for clinical trials are now under discussion as the next stage of development.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the process of consultation preceding the drawing up of his final limited list, he will take account of those cases where a branded product is cheaper than its stated generic alternative.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make inquiries of the pharmaceutical companies and wholesale and retail pharmacies about possible stock losses associated with the introduction of a limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate has been made of the additional administrative costs of policing and monitoring the new limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Arrangements already exist to monitor general practitioners' prescribing and we do not expect oversight of the operation of the limited list to add significantly to the administrative costs.

Contraception

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost to the National Health Service of birth control pills; and whether he has any plans to make all patients pay for them.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information identifies only the estimated ingredient cost of oral contraceptives prescribed by general practitioners. In England in 1983 this was £15·6 million.

We have no plans to make patients pay for family planning services.

Vaccine Damage (Compensation)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications for financial compensation under the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 were refused on the grounds that the person concerned was under 80 per cent. disabled.

Mr. John Patten: Up to 4 January 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, disablement was less than 80 per cent. in the following unsuccessful applications for a vaccine damage payment: 14 where the cause of such disablement was accepted as resulting from vaccination; 226 where the cause of such disablement was not accepted as resulting from vaccination; and 315 where the disablement was so substantially less than 80 per cent. that the cause was not investigated.

Operating Theatres

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the present staffing organisation of operating theatres in the light of the working of the Lewin report; if he is satisfied that there is a proper career structure for all of the non-medical professions involved in operating theatre work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are not aware of any general problems arising from either the organisation or staffing of operating theatres following the recommendations of the Lewin report which were commended to health authorities in 1972 after detailed consultation. One of the major concerns of the report was that there should be a proper career structure for the non-medical professions involved in this work. If my hon. Friend is concerned about the implementation of some particular recommendation perhaps he will write to me.

Drug Misuse

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications he has now had for grants under the central fund initiative for drug misuse; how many grants have been made; and for how much money.

Mr. John Patten: Applications received to date total 194. Of these, 90 have been approved, with a total value of £6·7 million.

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people inside and outside the community service section of his Department have some responsibility for dealing with the problems of drug misuse; and what are their grades.

Mr. John Patten: A substantial number of administrative and professional staff at all levels have some responsibility for dealing with the problems of drug misuse as part of their wider responsibilities.

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in the community service section of his Department are responsible for dealing solely with the problems of drug misuse; and what are their grades.

Mr. John Patten: The following staff in administrative grades of the community services division deal with the problems of drug misuse as the major part of their responsibilities. A wide variety of staff in other professional and administrative grades have some responsibility for the subject.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of individuals afforded temporary board and lodging in each of the 23 resettlement units in England, Scotland and Wales provided directly or indirectly by his Department during the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available; and, in the case of the Camberwell resettlement unit, what were the comparable figures for the three previous years.

Mr. Whitney: Figures are not collected in the form requested. The table shows the number of individuals admitted during the latest four-week period for which figures are available. It should be noted that an individual who used more than one unit during the four-week period was recorded as an individual in each unit visited. Comparative figures for Camberwell are available only for 1983. In the four-week period ending 22 November 1983, 751 individuals were accommodated at Camberwell.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of persons referred to the Camberwell resettlement unit during the two months ended 31 December 1984 and 31 March 1984, respectively, from each of the following sources: (a) local authority housing or social services departments (b) mental hospitals in the Greater London and Home Counties areas, (c) mental handicap hospitals in the Greater London and Home Counties areas, (d) general hospitals in the Greater London and Home Counties areas, (e) probation and aftercare offices and (f) supplementary benefit local offices.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not collected in the form requested, but the table may be of help.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many women were in each reception centre or settlement unit on the latest available date; what their ages were; how long each had been in residence; and what was the number in each institute who fell within section 2 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977;

(2) how many of the 600 homeless single persons in reception centres on the night of 30 November 1984 falling within section 2 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 were women; and what were their ages and disabilities.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that figures for the night of 30 November 1984 are not available. However, on the night of 31 December 1984 Camden resettlement unit accommodated 35 women and Cedars Lodge resettlement unit, 17 women. Of the six women who would fall to be considered within section 2 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 by virtue of being over 60 years of age, all were resident at Camden. Information is not collected on how many women would fall to be considered within the other categories under section 2 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, nor is information held centrally on disabilities. The tables show the age range and lengths of stay of the 52 women in the two women's resettlement units on the night of 31 December 1984.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total cost, in the last year for which figures are available, of meeting the rent of those homeless single people staying in private hostels, lodging homes, hotels, and so on; what was the number of individuals so housed; if there is a list of approved private hostels, lodging houses and similar establishments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that separate records are not kept in respect of people who enter board and lodging accommodation because they are homeless. The estimated expenditure on total supplementary benefit payments to all claimants in ordinary board and lodging accommodation, excluding residential care and nursing homes, in 1983 was £270 million. This figure is provisional and is based on caseload and average benefit payments at December 1983.

There is no central list of approved board and lodging establishments, but individual local authorities maintain their own records.

Fuel Direct Scheme

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the citizens' advice bureaux regarding problems with the fuel direct scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: In November 1983 the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux sent copies of its report "Poverty and Paying for Fuel: the CAB Experience" to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Energy and for Social Services, following which further representations were sent to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy in December 1984. Also in December 1984 the Greater London Citizens Advice Bureaux Service sent copies of its report "Cold Comfort for the Poor" to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy, as well as to my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and to myself. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) on 30 January, at column 228, concerning the administration of the fuel direct scheme.

Kidney Failure and Infertility

Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the expenditure in the most recent year for which records are available on (a) treatment of kidney failure and (b) treatment of infertility.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect centrally the specific information requested.

Benefits

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 19 December 1984, Official Report, column 219, if he will place in the Library copies of any recent evidence of the reasons for increases in the number of supplementary benefit claimants living in board and lodging accommodation.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to our consultative document, "Supplementary Benefit Board and Lodging Payments", containing the proposals which we have referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee, copies of which are in the Vote Office.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people of working age claimed supplementary benefit for 12 months and more in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the West Midlands and (c) the Walsall borough area in May 1979; and if he will give the latest figures for the three groups and the percentage difference in each case;

(2) how many people aged 45 years and over received supplementary benefit for 12 months and more in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the West Midlands and (c) the Walsall borough area in 1979; and if he will give the latest figures for the three groups and the percentage difference in each case.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not immediately available. I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people of working age claimed supplementary benefit in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the West Midlands area and (c) the Walsall borough area in May 1979; and if he will give the latest figures for the three groups and the percentage difference in each case.

Mr. Whitney: The information is as follows:

(thousands)

	May 1979	July 1984	Percentage increase
United Kingdom	1,355	3,400	151
Midlands area*	204	560	175

* Figures are for whole midlands area, since the West Midland social security region no longer exists.

Accident and Emergency Departments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what temporary closures of accident and emergency departments have occurred in the north-west in the last year, naming each hospital and the period of closure in each case; how this compares with each of the previous five years; and how it compares with national experience in this respect in each of these years.

Mr. John Patten: Such information is not collected centrally.

National Health Service

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, when replying to parliamentary questions about the National Health Service by suggesting that right hon. and hon. Members contact a health authority directly, he will make it his practice at the same time to ask the chairman of the health authority concerned to reply to such inquiries within a maximum of one week.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We take every opportunity to impress on health authority chairmen the need to deal speedily and thoroughly with all inquiries from right hon. and hon. Members. We know that they take this duty very seriously. Since there is reason to believe that some hon. Members decide not to make the contacts we suggest, it would not make sense to impose a uniform process and timetable on all chairmen in relation to all replies suggesting direct contact.

Heating Allowances

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average heating payment for severe weather on the last occasion such payments were made; how many so far have applied in 1985 for this payment; and what steps have been taken to publicise the matter in the areas where such applications can be made.

Mr. Whitney: The last occasion in which single payments were made towards heating costs in a period of exceptionally severe weather was in 1982, when the average payment was about £13. Information is not available centrally to estimate how many people have claimed payments so far this year. In areas in which the Chief Adjudication Officer has decided to advise local adjudication officers that the "exceptionally severe weather" condition in the regulations has been satisfied, local social security offices have instructions to display posters and provide leaflets explaining how and when to claim. Local authority social services departments and housing benefit offices, advice bureaux and public libraries have been asked to display posters and leaflets. The Department has also briefed the local media in the areas concerned.

Hospitals (Admissions)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons, and in particular babies and elderly people, have been refused admission to hospital for essential care in each of the last five years; how many have died as a result; and if he will give details by area, the condition of patients requiring treatment, the reasons for refusal of admission, and any other relevant circumstance.

Mr. John Patten: Such information is not collected centrally. I understand that, as far as Greater London is concerned, some of the information for which the hon. Member is asking is contained in a report about the emergency bed service which has been prepared for the South-East Thames regional health authority which manages that service. The hon. Member may like to contact the authority to obtain further information.

Premature Births

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many premature babies have been born each year in the last five years; how many received specialist care in hospital; how many after birth were turned away from specialist care each year; of those turned away, how many subsequently died or developed handicaps; and if he will name the hospitals concerned in each case.

Mr. John Patten: Full details of the number of premature babies are not collected centrally, but the numbers of low birthweight (2,500 grams or less) live-born babies in England in the five years ending 1983 are shown in the table. These will include the majority of premature live births, but will also include some full-term low birthweight babies. The information available to us does not distinguish accurately between premature and other babies who received specialist care in hospital. The remaining information requested is not available centrally.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will amend regulation 19 of the Social Security Act 1975, together with any other relevant legislation, so as to provide that workers who take seasonal jobs do not lose their entitlement to unemployment benefit after three successive years of such employment.

Mr. Whitney: I assume the hon. Member is referring to regulation 19 of the Social Security (Unemployment Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1975 as amended. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 29 January at column 162.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons in Wales were debarred, during 1984, from receiving unemployment insurance benefit; and how this compares with figures for each of the five preceding years.

Mr. Whitney: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of the nature of the material relating to claimants obtained by local officers of his Department from police criminal records and the vehicle licensing office; and what are the reasons for the compilation and retention of such records by his Department.

Mr. Newton Local officers do not obtain information about claimants to benefit from police criminal records, and I refer the hon. [redacted]er to my reply to him on 28 January at column 65. On occasions, during an investigation into suspected benefit fraud it may be necessary for details of the keepership of a vehicle to be obtained from the vehicle licensing centre.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the arrangements for liaison between local offices of his Department and the police in relation to claimants suspected of fraud; and if he will initiate discussions to ensure that no unnecessary material is retained by his Department.

Mr. Newton: The majority of suspected benefit fraud cases are investigated by local office staff without police assistance. There will be occasions, however, depending on the nature of the fraud, when it will be necessary for an investigating officer to seek the help of the police. There is no regular system for such liaison and no unnecessary material is obtained.

NHS (General Managers)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the general manager posts at regional, district and unit level for which he has vetted applicants, and also posts on family practitioner committees, indicating in each case those posts where he declined to approve the person initially chosen.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our guidance circular requires health authorities to allow Ministers the opportunity to express their views on all proposals for regional and district general manager appointments before formal decisions are taken. No unit general manager appointments have yet been made, but they are primarily the responsibility of the regional health authorities. Information on individual candidates is, and should remain, confidential.

There have been no such appointments for the family practitioner committees.

Long-stay Patients (Dental Examinations)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer on 14 January, Official Report, column 69, about dental examination for patients in long-stay hospitals, in what form the departmental guidance has been published; and to whom it has been sent.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The departmental guidance on the hopsital dental service was issued as a health memorandum, HM(67)61, originally to regional hospital boards, hospital management committees, and boards of governors, the responsible health authorities at that time. A copy of the memorandum is in the Library.

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many members of the West Midlands regional health authority will sit on the steering committee which will guide the review by outside consultants of the functions and working of the regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This has not yet been decided.

Hypothermia

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons have died of hypothermia, or where extreme cold was a factor associated with death, in each week since the start of winter; and how these figures compare with the same period in the previous five years.

Mr. John Patten: This information can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ophthalmic Services

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost saving to the National Health Service if the full assessed charge is payable by patients who require lenses over six dioptres cylindrical power, or over 10 dioptres spherical and over four dioptres cylindrical power, or lenticular.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 63]: The cost saving to the NHS if the full assessed charge were to be paid by all patients who require such lenses has been estimated as £1·75 million. However, a large proportion of these patients would qualify for full or partial remission of charges on income grounds so the actual savings are likely to be very much less.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many spectacles, on an annual basis, are prescribed in the categories: with one or more lens over six dioptres cylindrical power, over 10 dioptres spherical and over four dioptres cylindrical power, or lenticular;

(2) what percentage of the total number of annual prescriptions is represented by the categories defined as complex in amended regulations proposed by the Government;

(3) how many cases involving complex lenses, as defined in the Government's planned amendments to the general ophthalmic service, are dealt with (a) by the hospital eye service and (b) the general ophthalmic service, on an annual basis.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 63]: The total number of prescriptions issued for complex lenses is not available and the number dealt with by hospital eye services is not available centrally.

The latest available figures — 1983 — indicate that some 50,000 pairs of spectacles containing complex lenses as defined in the proposed regulations were dispensed annually in Great Britain under the general ophthalmic services. The estimated number dispensed within the proposed prescription categories is as follows:

over 6 dioptres cylindrical power	4,000
over 10 dioptres spherical and over 4 dioptres cylindrical power	5,000
in lenticular form	41,000

50,000 pairs of spectacles represent 1 per cent. of the total number of annual prescriptions dispensed under the general ophthalmic services.

Abortion

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many abortions were performed on residents and non-residents at up to 12 weeks gestation, 13 to 20 weeks gestation, 20 to 23 weeks gestation and 24 weeks and over for each year since 1968; on what grounds these were performed; what ages the women were; and how many were performed in the National Health Service and how many were performed in other approved places, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 61]: The available information is shown in the tables.

Footnotes to tables

A. Statutory grounds as listed in Schedule 2 of the Abortion Regulations 1968:
1. Risk to life of woman.
2. Risk of injury to physical or mental health of woman.
2. Risk of injury to physical or mental health of existing child(ren).
4. Substantial risk of child being born abnormal.
5. In emergency—to save life of woman.
6. In emergency—to prevent grave permanent injury to physical or mental health of woman.

B. From 1968 to 1980 gestation is calculated as the number of completed weeks between last menstral period and date of operation. In March 1981 a new notification form was introduced which seeks a direct statement of gestation and the basis on which it is derived.

C. Not stated gestation is included in All gestation.

D. Abortions to non-residents are assumed to have been performed in approved places.

Dash in table indicate "not available".

THE ARTS

South Bank Board

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts when he expects the Arts Council to announce the composition of the South Bank board.

Mr. Waldegrave: The date of any announcement will depend on the progress of the necessary legislation through Parliament.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Best asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people presently pay no income tax; and how many of these are (i) employed, (ii) unemployed and (iii) self-employed.

Mr. Moore: It is estimated that, in 1984-85, about 10 million married couples or single people aged 16 or over will not be liable to income tax. Of these, about 1¼ million will have spent the major part of the financial year in employment, 400,000 in self-employment and 1 million in unemployment. The remainder are retired or otherwise not economically active.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the reduction of the number of persons paying income tax if the income tax revenue was reduced by £1 billion, £2 billion, £3 billion, £4 billion, £5 billion, £7·5 billion and £10 billion, respectively, estimated as a result of raising tax thresholds.

Mr. Moore: Over the stated range of costs of direct revenue changes above indexation, each £1 billion reduction in the yield of income tax in a full year at 1985-86 levels of income would lead to a reduction of about 450,000 in the number of taxpayers. This assumes that uniform percentage increases are applied to the main personal allowances (including age allowance) and counts earning wives separately from their husbands.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what currently would be the loss of revenue resulting from a reduction in the higher rates of income tax to a maximum of 50 and 40 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Moore: The latest estimates are as follows:

Maximum rate of income tax per cent.	Direct revenue cost in a full year at 1985-86 levels of income £ million
50	320
40	970

These estimates are in relation to the yield assuming indexation of 1984-85 allowances and thresholds by 4·6 per cent. under the rules set out in the Finance Act 1980. It is also assumed that the thresholds for each remaining tax rate would remain at their indexed levels.

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate for each financial year since 1979-80, the costs of raising (a) the tax threshold and (b) the tax bands above the rate of inflation;

(2) if he will estimate the loss to the Exchequer in each year since 1979-80 resulting from the abolition of the higher rate bands for income tax;

(3) if he will estimate the costs to the Exchequer each year since 1979-80 of the reduction in the basic rate of taxation from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Economic Competitiveness

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his Department's estimate of the correlation between changes in the international competitiveness of the United Kingdom economy and changes in the pound sterling exchange rate.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The relationship between international price and cost competitiveness and the nominal exchange rate is complex, difficult to quantify reliably, and in the shorter term often highly erratic. However a Treasury working paper "Her Majesty's Treasury Macroeconomic Model: Supplement to the 1982 Technical Manual" (a copy of which is in the House of Common's Library) describes a model simulation of the effects of hypothetical changes in sterling's exchange rate index on wage cost competitiveness, and may be of interest to the hon. Member.

Friendly Societies

Mr. Freeman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will estimate the number of friendly societies that have closed as a result of the changes in tax exemption limits contained in the Finance Act 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The long-term decline in the number of friendly societies and number of branches continued in 1984. It is not possible to distinguish any effect of the tax and related statutory changes in 1984, which were favourable for some societies and adverse for others. None of the societies which went out of existence in 1984 told the Registry of Friendly Societies that the tax changes were the reason for it.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing at current prices for each year since 1980-81 (a) total revenue and total estimated revenue from value added tax and (b) total expenditure and total estimated expenditure on wages, salaries and pensions in the public sector.

Mr. Peter Rees: The following table shows receipts and expenditure by general Government (central Government and local authorities).

	Total receipts*	of which VAT	Total expenditure*	of which wages, salaries and pensions
	£ billion	£ billion	£ billion	£ billion
1980-81	95·1	10·1	108·4	31·6
1981-82	111·7	13·1	120·2	34·9
1982-83	121·7	14·7	132·5	37·4
1983-84	128·8	16·4	139·9	40·1

* Source: Section 2, Financial Statistics, National Accounts basis.

Mr. Gorst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of submissions that have been received by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise on the draft legislation for the collection of value added tax; and what proportion of those comments are in favour of the draft proposals.

Mr. Hayhoe: As at 28 January, 101 submissions had been received. As might be expected with a wide-ranging set of proposals, it is impossible to categorise the submissions simply as being in favour or not in favour of the proposals. Only 24 submissions deal with the proposals as a whole. These comprehensive submissions indicate a general acceptance of most of the proposals, but, together with a number of other submissions which have concentrated on a limited number of the proposals, have expressed some reservations or criticisms including certain points of principle in relation to particular clauses. All views expressed in response to the consultative document will be very carefully considered before final decisions are taken on the contents of the 1985 Finance Bill.

Earnings and Taxation

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the percentage of earnings absorbed by income tax and employees' social security contributions at different levels of earnings in the United Kingdom, France, Germany, and the United States of America and Japan, respectively, using the most recently available figures, and in the manner of his Answer to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on 15 February, Official Report, columns 198-200.

Mr. Moore: The information requested, for selected levels of employment income and family responsibilities, is as follows:

Percentage of earnings absorbed by income tax and social security contributions

Earnings per annum	£3,000	£5,000	£9,000	£12,000	£16,000	£20,000	£30,000	£50,000

Notes

1. The figures shown relate to income of 1984 (1984-85 in the case of the United Kingdom).
2. Conversions were made at the exchange rates prevailing on 23 January 1985. They may not fully reflect differences in purchasing power between sterling and the other currencies.
3. In addition to personal allowances, the tables take into account employment income reliefs and other standard reliefs (including income tax relief for social security contributions given in certain of the countries).
4. The income of the married couple is assumed to be wholly income of the husband.
5. The percentages given for a married couple with two dependent children reflect the tax and social security contributions due less any child benefit payable in respect of the children.
6. It is assumed that the United Kingdom employee is contracted-in to the state pension scheme.
7. The figures in brackets for the United States of America and Japan include local income taxes at typical rates.

Inland Revenue (Forms P11D)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many completed P11D forms have been submitted to the Inland Revenue for each of the last five years.

Mr. Moore: Estimates are as follows:

	Thousands
1979-80	500
1980-81	850
1981-82	1,100
1982-83	1,350
1983-84	1,600

Public Sector Staff

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many people were working in the National Health Service, local government, the Civil Service and nationalised industries in 1984; what was the total public expenditure on these services for the year; and if he will publish these numbers and costs both as a total and broken down between the four sectors mentioned;

(2) what is (a) the total number of civil servants employed in the United Kingdom in central Government Departments, and staff employed in local government in 1984, (b) the percentage of total population and total work force these figures represent, (c) the value of the total salaries paid to these two groups for the year and (d) the percentage of gross domestic product these salaries represent; and if he will give any information he may have as to equivalent figures in France, West Germany, the United States of America and Japan.

Mr. Peter Rees: Numbers employed (thousands) in the public sector at mid-1984 were as follows:

	Number
Central Government:
HM Forces	326
NHS	1,242
Civil Service (Great Britain)	630
Other	132
Local authorities	2,884
Public corporations:
Nationalised industries	1,416
Other	195
Total	6,825

Figures of population, working population, and gross domestic product are published in the Monthly Digest of Statistics. Public expenditure figures for 1984-85 are published in detail in Cmnd. 9428—"The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88". Estimates of the 1984-85 salary bill for the Civil Service was published in the 1983-84 memorandum by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on he Estimates. These documents are all available in House of Commons Library.

The qualifications attached to the use of employment data was explained in a written answer to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on 13 February 1984, at columns 64-66. That answer also indicated the difficulties in making international comparisons.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were in work in 1955 and in each succeeding fifth year to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: Figures for the employed labour force in the years requested are shown on page 99 of Economic Trends, Annual Supplement 1985.

EC (Budget Contributions)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total net payment by the United Kingdom to the European Economic Community in 1984; and what is the expected figure in 1985.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government's latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net payments to the European Community institutions in the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86 were recently published in the public expenditure White Paper, Cmnd, 9428. The calendar year is not an accounting period for purposes of United Kingdom expenditure and annual figures for United Kingdom payments by calendar year are available, only in arrears. Figures for 1984 will be available in due course when the December financial returns have been finalised.

Capital Transfer Tax

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cost to the Exchequer since 1980-81 of the alteration in the rates of capital transfer tax.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Investment Income Surcharge

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report his latest estimate of the costs to the Exchequer of the abolition of the investment income surcharge in 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

"Official Report"

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further progress has been made in the printing of the bound volumes of the Official Report for the year 1984; and when it is anticipated that these volumes will be brought up to date.

Mr. Hayhoe: Volume 52 of the Official Report covering the period from 16 to 27 January 1984 was published on 21 December 1984. Volume 43, the 1982-83 Sessional Index, is expected to be published during the week of 4 February. Volume 53 is now with the binders and Volumes 54 to 56 are in the final stages of production.

It is hoped that the backlog will be substantially reduced, if not eradicated, by the end of the next summer recess, and I am advised that the House authorities expect a regular production cycle of five months to be achieved by the end of 1985.

EC (Expenditure)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the proportion of the European Economic Community budget devoted to (a) agriculture, (b) regional development, (c) transport, (d) social fund, (e) energy, (f) science and technology, (g) industry and (h) research and investment for each year since 1972.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 160] Information for 1972 and the breakdown between transport, energy, science and technology, industry and research and investment are not readily available. The following table shows the percentage share for the major sectors of the Community's budgets between 1973 and 1984.

Written Answers to Questions

Friday 1 February 1985

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Cars (Parking Offences)

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister if she will instruct drivers of ministerial cars not to commit parking offences.

The Prime Minister: Under existing instructions, drivers of official cars are already required to do all they can to avoid breaching parking regulations.

Mr. Vic Norris

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Prime Minister if any Government Department or agency has at any time employed Mr. Vic Norris or his firm, Contingency Services; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Information of this kind is not held centrally.

Private Investigation Agencies

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Prime Minister if it is the policy of the Government to employ private agencies for the purposes of any confidential investigations or covert inquiries; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: There is no policy on the use of private agencies for confidential investigations, nor are any central records kept of the use of such agencies.

Research Budget

Mr. Steel asked the Prime Minister what representations she has received from the scientific community about the relative proportions of the research budget taken by defence and non-defence research, respectively; what information she has about how these relative proportions compare with the position in other Western countries; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have received no such representations.

Information about the broad pattern of Government research and development expenditure and a comparison of the relative proportions spent on defence and civil research in six major OECD countries is to be found in the 1984 annual review of Government funded R and D.

The Government's plans for defence and civil R and D expenditure have been set out in Cmnd. 9428, and these plans will be reviewed in the normal way during the course of this year's public expenditure survey.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nazi Germany (Victims)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonealth Affairs if any event is to be held by the wartime allies, the Governments of the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic to commemorate those Germans who suffered, and in many cases were executed, during Nazi rule for their resistance to the dictatorship and at the same time to commemorate all Germans who were the racial and political victims of Nazi rule.

Mr. Renton: I understand that Chancellor Kohl intends to speak at a commemoration of the liberation of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, organised by the Central Jewish Council, on 21 April. But I know of no plan by any of the wartime allies for any international commemoration of the tragic events referred to by the hon. Member.

EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the total cost of administration of his Department, expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The total cost of administration of the constituent parts of the Department expressed in 1983-84 prices in the last five years was as follows:

£ million

1983-84 prices	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Department of Employment	234·3	255·6	299·0	316·3	338·1
Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service	15·3	15·1	12·4	12·6	12·8
Manpower Services Commission	335·7	337·1	330·4	338·3	346·0
Health and Safety Commission	70·4	75·9	73·0	75·0	78·0
Total for the Department of Employment Group	655·7	683·7	714·8	742·2	774·9

This information is taken from the annual scrutinies of Departmental running costs.

Low pay (Definition)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the official definition of low pay; and how many male and female workers, respectively, are within this definition.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is no official definition of low pay.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action he intends to take in order to ensure that young people's representatives are able to participate as members of the area manpower boards which are responsible for the local oversight of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Matters relating to the compostion of area manpower boards will be considered as part of a review of boards which is currently being undertaken by the manpower Services Commission.

Mrs Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what alternative programmes or traineeships to those which will be terminated resulting from the closure of the 29 skillcentres he intends to initiate within the framework of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are currently considering the proposals endorsed by the Manpower Services Commission for the development of the skillcentre training agency. These proposals will not affect the Government's offer of a place on the youth training scheme to all those who are eligible.

Young people following courses under the scheme in skillcentres due to close by 1 April 1986 will be offered alternative training places, where necessary, to complete their training.

"Working Children"

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action he intends to take arising from the findings of the publication entitled "Working Children" by the low pay unit.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am asking the Health and Safety Commission to assess the implications of the report in respect of its responsibilities. I am satisfied that in general the Health and Safety Executive and the Wages Inspectorate have adequate powers and enforce the law where breaches come to their attention.

Youth Training and Employment

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many, by number and percentage, of those young people completing a youth opportunities programme or youth training scheme have transferred into immediate full-time employment at the end of the scheme, for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c. 259]: Information is not available in the precise form requested. The table is based on sample surveys conducted under both the youth opportunites programme and the youth training scheme and relates, by and large, to young people who left schemes in or around June of each year. The figures show the percentage of young people responding who were in full-time employment at the time of the surveys.

	Percentage in full-time employment
Youth opportunities programme
1979	58
1980	40
1981	47
1982	44
1983	49

1984	56

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Animals (School Premises)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he takes to ensure that secondary schools adhere to the guidelines issued by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals on the care of animals on school premises.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has published advice on the care and maintenance of living animals in schools in its booklets "Safety in Practical Subjects" and "Safety in Science Laboratories" and has drawn attention in these booklets to other sources of advice to schools. It is for local education authorities and individual primary and secondary schools to ensure that suitable procedures for the care of animals are followed.

West Indian Pupils

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what resources he plans to make available for the purpose of improving education provision for West Indian school pupils to enable them to acquire higher standard GCE and CSE level results.

Mr. Dunn: The achievement of school pupils of West Indian origin is among the subjects under review by the committee of inquiry into the education of children from ethnic minority groups.

I understand that the committee has held its last meeting and intends to submit its report to my right hon. Friend after some final editorial work. The Government will want to consider whether action is needed in the light of the committee's findings.

Nursery Teachers (Training)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what provisions he will make for specialist nursery training methods for teachers of four-year-old children attending primary schools; and what steps he will take to monitor the progress of such pupils in comparison with older classmates.

Mr. Dunn: The new criteria for the assessment of initial teacher training courses, issued by my right hon. Friend with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales in April 1984, require that in future the approach to teaching methods in courses should differentiate according to the age group which the student intends to teach—whether primary or secondary—and that within primary special emphasis should be given to particular age ranges such as 3 to 8. In 1983 the Department invited institutions with training expertise in the 3 to 8 age group to develop specialist work on the nursery years within their courses. HMI is in the process of visiting those institutions and discussing their plans with them. Qualified teachers have the opportunity to augment their initial training by taking one of a number of one-term, in-service courses specialising in nursery teaching.

In the course of visits to primary schools HMI looks specifically at provision for the under-fives and, through its reports, which are now published, and the courses which it runs for teachers it makes known to those responsible its views on best practice.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Northern Ireland

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of deaths which have occurred in Great Britain from 1 January 1969 to the latest available date in each year connected with present civil unrest in Northern Ireland; and how many of those deaths were caused by action taken by the police and each of the known terrorist or paramilitary groups.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The available information for England and Wales is shown in the following table. The table covers offences of homicide which have been attributed on the evidence available to acts of terrorism connected with Northern Ireland, but the coverage may not be complete. For information for Scotland, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland on 28 January 1985 at column 17.

*Provisional

Television Licence Fee

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received regarding the proposed increase in the level of the television licence fee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on 31 January at columns 397-98.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drugs Misuse

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new steps the Government intend to take to tackle the problems arising from drug abuse.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rombold) on 31 January at columns 243-44.

Coaches (Speeding)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought regarding alleged offences of speeding by coaches since May 1984; what has been the average of fine since that date; and how this compares with the average level in the 12 months preceding the increase in maximum penalties in May 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The available information relates to total proceedings for speed limit offences for all vehicles and average amounts of fines imposed at magistrates' courts for the offence categories shown in table 5 of "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, 1983", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. No reliable information is available for specific types of vehicles. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Styal Prison

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he has any proposals to end the use of Her Majesty's prison, Styal, for youth custody prisoners; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what policy is followed for the accommodation of youth custody prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Styal.

Mr. Mellor: Separate living accommodation is provided at Her Majesty's prison and youth custody centre, Styal, for those sentenced to youth custody and to imprisonment: the facilities of the establishment are shared by both groups. Selected youth custody trainees are, however, located in the prison and selected adults in the youth custody centre. This gives maximum flexibility in the use of the accommodation and allows some mixing of female adult prisoners with female young offenders which can be beneficial to both groups. We have no plans to alter this general arrangement. As a response to recent incidents of misbehaviour, the youth custody trainees at Styal have, as an interim measure, been dispersed more widely throughout the establishment, so as to benefit more from the stabilising influence of the adult prisoners.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners under the age of 17 years are held at Her Majesty's prison, Styal;

(2) how many adult prisoners and youth custody prisoners, respectively, are detained at Her Majesty's prison, Styal.

Mr. Mellor: On 25 January 1985 190 adults and 47 youth custody trainees, of whom six were aged under 17 years, were accommodated at Her Majesty's prison and youth custody centre, Styal.

Detained Persons (Deaths)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have died in police custody in each of the last five years, with a breakdown by cause of death; in how many cases each year inquests were held; and what was the result of the inquest in each case.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of persons who died in police custody during the years 1980 to 1983, together with the cause of death, number of inquests and inquest verdicts, is contained in the annual reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary — HC 409 (1980), 463 (1981), 15 (1982) and 528 (1983)—and, for those within the Metropolitan police district, in the annual reports of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis (Cmnd. 8254, 8569, 8928 and 9268).

Information for 1984 is not yet available but will be included in the 1984 reports of the Chief Inspector and the Commissioner.

Mrs. Jagjit Kaur Kahlon

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood of 28 November about the case of Mrs. Jagjit Kaur Kahlon.

Mr. Waddington: Mrs. Jagjit Kaur Kahlon and her husband were interviewed in New Delhi on 19 November 1984. A second interview is to be arranged as a matter of priority so that a full report covering all the issues we need to consider can be prepared. Once that report has been received and considered I shall write to the hon. Member.

Motorways (Police Surveillance)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what resources he will make available for the provision of higher police manning levels on motorways to supervise adherence by motorists to recommended speed limits in conditions of extreme cold weather and very poor visibility conditions.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Deployment to particular policing tasks is a matter for chief constables. Police authorities are responsible for fixing the authorised establishment of forces, subject to my right hon. and learned Friend's approval. In considering an application to approve an increase in establishment he takes careful account of any motorway policing requirements.

Public Order

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he expects to publish the report of his review of public order legislation; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to permit him to ban processions without the prior need for an application from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis or the appropriate local authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The procedure for banning marches under section 3 of the Public Order Act 1936 is one of the matters considered in the review of public order law, whose conclusions my right hon. and learned Friend hopes to announce as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Average Incomes

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average income in 1955 and in each succeeding fifth year expressed in constant prices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: Average income—personal income per capital—at constant prices for the years requested was as follows:

1955	1,782
1960	2,081
1965	2,437
1970	2,734
1975	3,308
1980	3,571

These figures are based on data in Economic Trends annual supplement (1985 edition) tables 18 and 45.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer who were the directors of Johnson Matthey Bankers at the time of the rescue operation mounted by the Bank of England; and if any of these persons are currently holding directorships or other positions of responsibility in any firm or organisation in receipt of public funds.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The directors of Johnson Matthey Bankers at the time of the rescue operation mounted by the Bank of England were:

Mr. E. G. Peterman (Chairman).
Mr. P. D. F. Varrall (Deputy Chairman).
Mr. R. G. Wheeler (Managing Director).
Mr. P. J. C. Firth (Deputy Managing Director).
Mr. P. J. K. Smith.
Mr. I. R. Fraser.
Mr. J. J. Shaw.
Mr. I. J. Thornburn.

The executive directors were Mr. Wheeler, Mr. Firth, Mr. Smith and Mr. Fraser. Mr. Shaw and Mr. Smith continue to be directors, but the other six were obliged to resign.

I regret that the further information requested by the hon. Member is not readily or fully obtainable, and could in any case be provided only at disproportionate cost. The main reasons for this are that no central register is kept of firms and organisations in receipt of public funds, and former directors of recognised banks or licensed deposit-taking institutions are not obliged to inform the authorities of their directorships.

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the increase in the European Economic Community own resources when the maximum value added tax rate is raised to 1·4 per cent.

Mr. Ian Stewart: After allowing for the United Kingdom's VAT abatement as a result of the Fontainebleau mechanism—as well as relief to Germany in respect of the financing of that abatement—the potential increase in the amount of revenue available to the Community as a result of raising the VAT ceiling from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. will be some 15 to 20 per cent.

Betting Duty

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what percentage the off-course general betting duty would have to be increased in order to offset the abolition of the on-course general betting duty or a reduction of the on-course general betting duty by 2 per cent.

Mr. Hayhoe: The current off-course rate of general betting duty would have to go up by 0·5 and 0·25 percentage points respectively.

Sterling (Exchange Rate)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in the US dollar to the pound sterling exchange rate since May 1979; and what was the change in the preceding five years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The percentage changes in the US dollar's exchange rate against the pound sterling during the periods requested were as follows:

May 1974-May 1979	+17·3
May 1979-Jan 1985*	+82·3

(*average to 29 January).

Developing Countries (IMF Conditions)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the International Monetary Fund imposes any conditions relating to purchase of arms or level of military expenditure when making loans to, or rescheduling the debt of, developing countries; and what policy on these matters is put forward by the United Kingdom representative.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No, the IMF does not impose any such conditions in its loans to member countries. The fund itself does not reschedule countries' debts, though other creditors may choose to take account of IMF conditionality in deciding whether to reschedule. United Kingdom support for applications for IMF loans depends on their technical merits.

Social Security

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of gross domestic product at market prices was allocated to expenditure on social security in 1983-84; and what he expects the outturn to be for 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Rees: The recently published public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) showed the latest estimated outturn expenditure on social security in the United Kingdom for 1983-84 as £36,301 million and an expected outturn for 1984-85 of £39,145 million. Social security benefit payments—which account for some 96 per cent. of all social security expenditure — are considered to be transfer payments and, therefore, do not form part of gross domestic product. However, if the figures are expressed as a percentage of GDP, they would amount to 11·9 per cent. and 12·0 per cent. respectively.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to the answer to the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire, Official Report, 15 January, columns 119-20, if he can anticipate the date by which the response by the Commission to the Government's reply to the reasoned opinion under article 169 of the treaty of Rome alleging that certain aspects of the value added tax zero rates enforced in the United Kingdom, including those applicable for non-domestic construction work, are contrary to the provisions of the sixth value added tax directive, is likely to be received.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is entirely for the Commission to decide in the light of our reply whether further action on its part is justified. I have no indication when it is likely to reach a decision.

EC (Expenditure)

Mr. Fowlkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what percentage total European Economic Community expenditure has increased in each year since 1970.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 160]: Information prior to 1973 is not readily available.

The remainder of the information requested is set out in the table. The budget figures to which the percentages relate were established in units of account (ua) before 1978; from 1978 until 1980 they were established in European units of account (eua). Since these two units were calculated on different bases they are not directly comparable, except in the case of the European development fund for which it was agreed that a conversion rate of 1ua = 1eua would be adopted. Community budgets from 1981 have been established in European currency units (ecu), with the agreement that 1ecu = 1eua for the years 1981 and 1982.

Percentage increase over previous year of 1 per cent.

WALES

Heath Hospital, Cardiff

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of the £4 million repair work required to put right building defects in the Heath hospital, Cardiff; if he will indicate the amounts of cash he proposes to spend in the immediate years ahead; if the £4 million is to be taken from the budget of South Glamorgan area health authority or from the all-Wales capital programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The total cost of the remedial work under-taken to date is £2,718,000 made up as follows:

1980-81
Repair of Mosaics	1,050,000
1981-82
Defects in Pembroke House and Ward B4G	154,000
Brecknock House	156,000
1982-83
Tower Block and Paediatric Department	224,000
1983-84
Carmarthen House	190,000
1984-85

Denbigh House	227,000
Elevated Roads	188,000
Dental Block and Ward Block	529,000
	2,718,000

The estimated expenditure required to complete the works is £1,135,000 made up as follows:

1985-86
Glamorgan, Radnor and Meirionydd Houses	510,000
Tunnels	175,000
Central Complex	110,000
1986-87
Cardigan House	340,000
	1,135,000

The full cost of the remedial work will be borne by the all-Wales capital programme.

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether, as a result of the settlement reached on 10 February 1984 between the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation and S. W. Milburn and Partners and W. S. Atkins and Partners pertaining to structural and material defects in the Heath hospital, Cardiff, any sums have been or will be, paid into the Consolidated Fund directly or indirectly; by whom; and where in the Estimates and Appropriation Accounts such sums are, or will be, recorded.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There was no direct payment into the Consolidated Fund. The payment received by the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation was offset against payments due for remedial work at the University hospital of Wales.

A summary of all Welsh health authorities' losses and compensation is included in the summarised accounts of health authorities presented annually and published as a White Paper.

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total cost of remedial work done on the Heath hospital, Cardiff, during its construction; what is the estimated expenditure in 1985 costs to effect the work specified in the Ove Arup report as needing immediate remedial action; and what is the additional cost of remedial work specified in the report, including roofs, needing future remedial action.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Any remedial work done on the Heath hospital during construction was undertaken within the terms of the construction contract. The actual expenditure on completed remedial work and expected expenditure at 1985 prices on remedial work yet to be undertaken on the elements in the Ove Arup report which were accepted as requiring urgent attention are listed in my written answer of today to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones). Other work not considered to be immediate will form part of the South Glamorgan district health authority's normal maintenance and repair programme.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what amount of the Housing Corporation's gross expenditure in Wales in 1983-84 was accounted for by value added tax.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Precise information cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost, but the Housing Corporation estimates that VAT accounted for a very small proportion of the gross expenditure in 1983-84.

Chiropodists

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many chiropodists there are in the National Health Service in Wales, by each of the area health authority areas; if he is satisfied with this level of provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The numbers of chiropodists are as follows:

Health Authority	At 30 September 1984
	Number	Whole-time equivalent
Clwyd	13	13·0
East Dyfed	11	10·6
Gwent	21	20·5
Gwynedd	14	12·8
Mid Glamorgan	32	31·0
Pembrokeshire	4	3·5
Powys	10	9·3
South Glamorgan	25	22·2
West Glamorgan	32	30·3

It is for individual health authorities to decide whether this level of provision is satisfactory.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report for each Manpower Services Commission area the number of (a) 16-year-olds and (b) 17-year-olds to enter the youth training scheme in Wales in 1985-86 on the basis of the 12 November 1984 rules; if he proposes to increase the youth training scheme allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No decision has yet been taken. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Grenada

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to offer further aid to the new Government of Grenada.

Mr. Raison: I am today informing the Grenada Government that we are prepared to make available a new interest-free loan of £5 million, for expenditure over about five years, on capital projects to be agreed between our two Governments. This follows an initial commitment of £750,000 which I announced to the House on 28 November 1983, at column 378, and a subsequent £1 million loan which I announced on 7 February 1984 at columns 566-67.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Outgoers Scheme

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many producers have now committed themselves to becoming outgoers; and whether any more are to be invited to join the scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: By 25 January 1985 1,237 producers in England and Wales had committed themselves to surrendering a total of 150·3 million litres of quota in a full year. Others still have to decide whether or not to go out of production, and as their decisions become known we will send out further invitations as and when we need to replace any who drop out.

To date, invitations have been sent to those with up to 367,000 litres, and this week a further 80 producers, with up to 387,000 litres, are to be invited to join the scheme. Previously we have excluded a small number of producers because their milk production was only a relatively small part of their overall farming enterprise. However, now that we are increasingly inviting much larger producers, this restriction is no longer being applied.

TRANSPORT

Buses

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received from metropolitan counties on his White Paper "Buses."

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received representions from six metropolitan county councils, the passenger transport executives, a number of metropolitan district councils and from numerous individuals in the metropolitan areas. The content of the representations has been varied but in general has favoured continuation of the existing local monopoliés, which are advantageous to bus operators rather than passengers, who will benefit from the Government's policy of fair competition.

Combined Transport

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assistance has been made available in each of the countries of the European Community to combined transport operators under European Economic Community directive 82/603/EEC and European Economic Community regulations 1107/70 as amended by regulation 1658/82.

Mr. David Mitchell: No such assistance has been provided in the United Kingdom. Details of assistance in other European Community countries are not available.

Hurn Airport (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport why, in the light of the fact that Hurn airport, Christchurch, lies wholly within the borough of Christchurch, he has made no contact with the borough council about his forthcoming visit, nor has he or his Department invited the council as such to be present during his visit.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The arrangements for my visit to Bournemouth (Hurn) airport were a matter for its joint owners, Dorset county council and Bournemouth borough council.

Lorry Ban Proposals (GLC)

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has completed his consultations with the Greater London council on its lorry ban proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have considered carefully all aspects of the Greater London council's proposals and the points made by it is response to consultation.

Having done so, I am satisfied that in deciding to proceed with its lorry ban proposals without a public inquiry the GLC was not satisfactorily discharging its duty under section 122 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 and that my direction is necessary to secure compliance with that duty.

Accordingly, I have issued a direction under that Act to the GLC, a copy of which is being placed in the Library of the House.

The effect of that direction is to require the GLC to seek my consent to introduction of its proposals for a night-time and weekend lorry ban.

If my consent is sought, it would be my intention to establish a public inquiry so that the GLC's scheme, the many issues it raises and the many objections it has attracted can be publicly and impartially weighed. I would then decide whether or not to give my consent in the light of that inquiry's findings.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has made any arrangements to allow the recording of injury accidents, which may involve electrically assisted pedal cycles, in the stats 19 system.

Mrs. Chalker: At present the arrangement is that these vehicles be included with ordinary pedal cycles. However, the Department is consulting local authorities and police forces with a view to using a "special projects" box on the stats 19 form to record vehicles such as the C5.

Electrically Assisted Pedal Cycle Regulations

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to monitor the operation of the Electrically Assisted Pedal Cycles Regulations.

Mrs. Chalker: We are watching developments and the Transport and Road Research Laboratory will look at models of electrically assisted cycle produced on a substantial scale.

Airports Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish his White Paper on airports policy; if the White Paper will set out his latest ideas on privatisation of the British Airports Authority and on local authority airports; if he will list the main subjects to be dealt with in the White Paper; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport intends to make a comprehensive statement on airports policy when he and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announce their decisions on the Stansted/Heathrow terminal 5 planning inquiries.

Vehicle Speed Limiters

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for Transport what tests have been conducted recently by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory on the use of vehicle speed limiters for lorries and buses; and with what results.

Mrs. Chalker: The Transport and Road Research Laboratory has carried out limited tests on one speed-limiting device. This performed satisfactorily in controlling speeds and safely reverted the vehicle to normal accelerator control when electrical failure was deliberately induced.

M6 (Accident Statistics)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents have arisen on the M6 motorway between junctions 1 and 12 during the last five years; and how many motorists' deaths have occurred as a result.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

M6 Road accidents and fatalities between junctions 1 and 12: 1981 to 1983

	1981	1982	1983
All injury accidents	193	178	192
Deaths	6	5	8

Data for further years could be given only at disproportionate cost.

ENERGY

Spent Reactor Fuel

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Energy what provisions are currently planned for the long-term dry storage of spent advanced gas-cooled reactor fuel; what bodies have been delegated responsibility for such provision; and what arrangements are proposed for financing such provision in (a) Scotland and (b) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Goodlad: No commitments have been made to date.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish estimates of the number of homes heated by combined heat and power in the United Kingdom, Germany, France, and Denmark; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Estimates of the number of dwellings connected to combined heat and power/district heating plant are not available.

Fuel Disconnections

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied with the working of the fuel industries' code of practice on disconnections.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The operation of the code is being monitored by the Electricity and Gas Consumers' Councils. Their reports to date indicate that the code is working satisfactorily.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the trend in the number of (a) gas and (b) electricity disconnections over the last four quarters for which figures are available.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have asked the chairmen of the British Gas Corporation and the Electricity Council to provide the figures direct to the hon. Member.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what response he has made to the report on fuel disconnections by the Policy Studies Institute.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens) on 29 March 1982 at column 25.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will introduce legislation to remove the power of disconnection from the gas and electricity supply industries and to confer responsibility for such decisions either upon the county courts or some other arbitration body.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: No.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the last inspection date for all nuclear power stations and the next expected date.

Mr. Goodlad: To ensure compliance with conditions attached to nuclear site licences and to provide an overall surveillance of activities affecting safety on a licensed site, inspectors from Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate pay regular and frequent visits—usually at least once a month—to each licensed nuclear power station site for two or three days at a time, or for longer periods if necessary.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the normal inspection procedure for nuclear power stations; and how often installations are partially or completely shut down or not producing electricity during such inspections.

Mr. Goodlad: Inspectors of Her Majesty's Installations Inspectorate pay frequent visits—usually monthly—to licensed nuclear power station sites. Nuclear power reactors are required to be shut down every two years for maintenance and inspection under conditions attached to their nuclear site licences. Nuclear power reactors may also be shut down or run at reduced power from time to time for operational reasons.

Electricity (Imports)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the quantity of electricity imported from France, and any other European country, via the European grid for each month since April 1984 and for each year since 1972.

Mr. Goodlad: No electricity has been imported from France or any other European country since 1982. I understand from the CEGB that since 1972 the net flows of electricity via the 160MW link with France—now decommissioned—were as follows:

Year ending 31 March	Net Imports/ Exports* (gigawatt hours)
1972	280
1973	273
1974	159
1975	11
1976	3
1977	−88
1978	nil
1979	−76
1980	−2
1981	3
1982	nil

* minus sign (−) indicates exports.

DEFENCE

Eastern Atlantic

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the United States maritime prepositioning ships allocated to the eastern Atlantic will come under Standing Naval Force Atlantic.

Mr. Stanley: This is a matter for the United States authorities.

Mr. D.E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any British port will act as a regular port of call to the United States maritime prepositioning ships allocated to the eastern Atlantic; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Security considerations prevent me from commenting on the operational movement plans for these ships.

Ethiopia

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will discuss with Royal Air Force commanders means to ensure that supplies dropped from C130 Hercules aircraft of RAF Support Command in Eritrea and Tigre reach the local population and do not fall into the hands of the Ethiopian army.

Mr. Stanley: We agreed that the RAF should air-drop supplies, initially in Shewa province, on the clear understanding that food would go only to those in need. The RAF was invited by the Ethiopians to observe distribution arrangements on the ground and two members of the detachment were present at the dropping zone when a trial was conducted on 26 January. The RAF remains fully prepared to assist with air-dropping, but the Ethiopian authorities have not so far agreed that air-dropping can commence on a regular basis.

Towed Arrays

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the use of towed arrays in the Royal Navy.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

SCOTLAND

Private Hospitals

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of private hospitals which offered acute/surgical care, the number of beds and the occupancy rate for all facilities offering such care by region in each of the last five years.

Mr. John MacKay: Information on occupancy rates is not available centrally; but the remaining information is as follows:

Pay Beds

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of authorised National Health Service pay beds, the number of deaths and discharges of patients, and the average daily occupancy of National Health Service pay beds, giving numbers and percentages for each region for each of the last five years.

Mr. John MacKay: The information available centrally is given in the following table. Information on deaths and discharges is not available centrally.

Amenity Beds

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of National Health Service amenity beds, deaths and discharges of patients and average daily occupancy, giving numbers and percentages, for each region for each of the last five years.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally.

Housing Co-operatives

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what encouragement his Department is providing for the development of tenant management co-operatives and par value co-operatives; and what initiatives his Department has taken over the recommendations made in the report of the Housing Co-operatives Review Committee, published in December 1983, following upon the conference attended by the Minister with responsibility for housing in Scotland for September 1982.

Mr. Ancram: The development of tenant management and par value co-operatives is primarily the responsibility of the housing authorities concerned locally. The Scottish Development Department does, however, provide financial assistance to the tenant participation advisory service, which is responsible for developing interest in and knowledge of all forms of tenant participation, including management and par value co-operatives. The Scottish Development Department is also in close touch with Glasgow district council over its innovative proposals for the development of par value community ownership schemes.

I have welcomed the report of the Housing Co-operatives Review Committee, most of whose recommendations call for action by housing authorities. The Scottish Development Department has been giving consideration to the recommendations which affect central Government and will shortly be meeting officers of the tenant participation advisory service to discuss them further.

Public Transport (Deregulation)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what research he has commissioned or experimentation he will commission into the likely effects of deregulation of public transport as proposed in the Government's White Paper on buses—Cmnd. 9300—in urban and rural areas in Scotland;

(2) what assessment he has made of experience of deregulation in Hereford and Australia in the context of public transport needs in the regions and islands of Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The Scottish Development Department keeps in close touch both with relevant research on public transport and with local transport needs and circumstances in Scotland and will continue to do so.

Abortion Statistics

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will give a breakdown by number of previous children of those women resident in Scotland upon whom abortions were performed in each of the following years: 1969, 1970, 1974, 1978, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983;

(2) if he will give a breakdown by marital status of the women of the total number of abortions performed in each of the following years on resident women in Scotland in 1969, 1970, 1974, 1978, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983;

(3) if he will give a breakdown of the number of abortions performed in Scotland on resident women by the statutory grounds for which those abortions were performed in each of the following years: 1969, 1970, 1974, 1978, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and what was the total number of abortions performed on such women in each of those years.

Mr. John MacKay: Information about abortions performed in Scotland showing parity, marital state and statutory grounds for abortion is given in section 5 of "Scottish Health Statistics," published annually and available in the Library.

The 1974 edition also includes data on marital state and statutory grounds for the years 1969 and 1970 but gives parity for 1974 only. Parity* figures for the earlier years requested are as follows:

Parity figures*

Number of previous children	1969	1970
None	1,200	1,870
1	360	476
2	530	806

* The number of preceding completed pregancies.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give a breakdown of the total number of abortions performed on women resident in Scotland by the following gestational ages of the foetus: under nine weeks, nine weeks, 10 weeks, 11 weeks, 12 weeks, 13 weeks, 14 weeks, 15 to 19 weeks, 20 to 23 weeks and over 24 weeks in each of the following years: 1969, 1975, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. John McKay: Data are not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The nearest available information to that requested is for periods of gestation under 10 weeks, 10 to 13 weeks, 14 to 17 weeks, 18 to 19 weeks, 20 to 24 weeks and 25 weeks and over; details for 1975 and the later years requested are given in table 5.3 of "Scottish Health Statistics" 1982 and 1983, copies of which are in the Library. The figures for 1969 are:

Period of gestation (weeks)	Number

Birth Statistics

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state (a) the total number of live births, (b) the total number of illegitimate live births, (c) the ratio of live births to abortions and (d) the number of illegitimate births as a percentage of live births for women who are aged (i) over 20 years and (ii) under 20 years, and resident in Scotland in each of the following years: 1967, 1969, 1974, 1978, 1980, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. John MacKay: Tables A1.1 and S1.1 of the 1983 annual report of the Registrar General for Scotland and table S1.1 of the 1974 report give data (other than percentages) about the requests at (a), (b) and (d). The ratios for live births to abortions for all women are as follows:

	Ratio
1967	n/a
1969	25:1
1974	9:1
1978	9:1
1980	9:1
1982	8:1
1983	8:1

THE ARTS

Cash Limits

Mr. Waller asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if it is intended to change any of the cash limits for which the Minister for the Arts is responsible.

Mr. Waldegrave: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary spring Supplementary Estimate my right hon. and noble Friend proposes to increase the 1984-85 cash limit on Class V, Vote 10—Arts, the Arts Council and other institutions, The National Heritage and the Government Art Collection — by £241,000 from £123,900,000 to £124,141,000. The net increase is required to meet the cost of residual payments by the South Bank Theatre Board to its contractors and consultants in connection with erecting and equipping the National theatre building. The expenditure will be charged to the Reserve.

NORTHERN IRELAND

State-enrolled Nurses

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many state-enrolled nurses employed in Northern Ireland were trained in the Republic of Ireland; whether reciprocal arrangements exist for state-enrolled nurses trained in Northern Ireland to be employed in the Republic of Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No state-enrolled nurses employed in Northern Ireland were trained in the Republic of Ireland. There are no reciprocal arrangements between the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland for the employment of state-enrolled nurses in the Irish Republic.

Cattle, Sheep and Pigs

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many live cattle, sheep and pigs have been exported to the Irish Republic in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

Thousand

	Cattle	*Sheep	Pigs
1979	130·4	244	16·5
1980	60·1	449	272·6
1981	86·3	538	583·3
1982	48·3	509	594·6
1983	15·3	446	516·4

* Estimated numbers.

Private Hospitals

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of private hospitals that offered acute surgical care, the numbers of beds and the occupancy rate for all facilities offering such care, by region in each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: There are two private hospitals in Northern Ireland providing acute surgical care, the Ulster independent clinic in the Eastern Health and Social Services Board area and the St. John of God hospital in the Southern Health and Social Services Board area. The number of beds in each is 50 and 36, respectively, although these are not used exclusively for acute care. Information on bed occupancy rate is not held centrally.

Amenity Beds

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of National Health Service amenity beds, deaths and discharges of patients, and average daily occupancy, giving numbers and percentages, for each region for each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: Hospital beds are not specifically designated for amenity purposes. The remainder of the information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pay Beds

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of authorised National Health Service pay beds, the number of deaths and discharges of patients, and the average daily occupancy of National Health Service beds, giving numbers and percentages, for each region for each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: Details of availability and uptake of accommodation by hospital private patients in each of the last five years are set out as follows.

These beds, when not occupied by private patients, are used by Health Service patients. Information on discharges and deaths is not recorded separately for private patients.

Exceptional Heating Allowance

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has now approved an exceptional heating allowance to persons in receipt of supplementary benefits to ameliorate the effects of the severe weather in Northern Ireland; what criteria are used to determine when such an allowance is paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c. 298]: A single payment of supplementary benefit can be made where a period of exceptionally severe weather has resulted in greater than normal fuel consumption and a claimant has not put aside enough money to meet the extra cost. A decision on whether or not the conditions prescribed in the relevant regulations are satisfied rests with the independent adjudication authorities. Following discussions with the Meteorological Office, the Chief Adjudication Officer for Northern Ireland has issued guidance on the temperature level at which the weather condition should be regarded as satisfied. This is based on criteria published in paragraphs 7426 to 7449 and appendix 19 of the Northern Ireland S manual, and takes account of temperature data supplied by the Meteorological Office. The relevant trigger point has not yet been reached in Northern Ireland, but, if it is, the Department of Health and Social Services will publicise the fact and provide information on how claims for single payments should be made.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Lord Lewin

Mr. Foulkes asked the Attorney-General if he will prosecute under the Official Secrets Act the former chief of the defence staff, Lord Lewin, for describing in an interview on 29 June 1984 the use of the towed array system in detecting the General Belgrano.

The Attorney-General: If the hon. Gentleman would care to write to me identifying what is alleged to have been said and to whom on 29 June 1984, I will consider it.

Official Secrets Act 1911

Mr. Dobson asked the Attorney-General if he will provide details of proceedings that have been commenced under sections 1 and 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 since 9 February 1983 set out in the manner of appendix II to the Franks report.

The Attorney-General [pursuant to his answer, 28 January 1985, c. 37-38]: One further prosecution was commenced in 1984 under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911. A civilian employee of a police force disclosed information obtained from the police national computer to a company trading in burglar alarms.

My answer also erroneously described the prosecution in 1984 of a Foreign Office clerk as arising from the disclosure of minutes written "by her Secretary of State to colleagues" although in fact the minutes were sent to her Secretary of State.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Chatsworth Collection

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, in respect of the drawings sold at auction on 3 July from the Chatsworth collection (i) the number of export licences applied for which were (a) referred to and (b) not referred to the Reviewing Committee for the Export of Works of Art, (ii) the number of export licences which have been issued in normal course (a) by 12 November and (b) at the latest available date and (iii) how many of the export licences applied for have now beeen issued (a) in respect of applications referred to the Reviewing Committee and (b) in respect of applications not so referred; and if he will also set out the position separately regarding individual applications in each category in respect of which licences have not been issued;

(2) whether the figures for the numbers of export licences issued in respect of drawings from the Chatsworth collection contained in the replies by his right hon, Friend the Minister of State, Official Report, 12 November 1984, column 85, and by his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Official Report, 9 January, column 448, were compiled on the same basis.

Mr. Channon: The figures given in the two replies were compiled on the same basis. Of the 61 export licence applications received for drawings known to have come from the Chatsworth collection, 21 were referred to the reviewing committee. On the advice of the committee, export licences were temporarily withheld in respect of 13 of the applications so referred, but were later issued in respect of 12 of these: only in the remaining case was an offer made to purchase the work on behalf of a British collection. Licences have also been issued in respect of all the applications not referred to the reviewing committee —40 in number—in respect of those applications which were referred to the committee but where the committee did not recommend that licences should be withheld—eight in number. It has been the practice of successive governments not to provide information about export licences applied for or issued for reasons of commercial confidentiality. I regret that I therefore cannot provide the further details requested.

Telegram Service

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether he has given consideration to the restoration of a telegram service in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is his assessment of the savings resulting from the ending of the telegram service since its termination;

(3) what representations he has received calling for the restoration of the telegram service;

(4) how many tele-messages have been sent in each year since the termination of the telegram; and how many telegrams were sent in the equivalent period before termination;

(5) what profit or loss has been made by the tele-message service each year since its inception;

(6) what proportion of tele-messages were delivered within 24 hours in each year since the termination of the telegram.

Mr. Butcher: I have to say that the questions asked are primarily matters that are the responsibility of BT and the details of the services it offers are a matter for its commercial judgment within the terms of its licence and current legislation. However, I can say that I have received no recent representations about the ending of the inland telegram service nor proposals for the establishment of a new service. I regret that I am unable to provide some of the information requested as this can only be supplied by BT and I understand is commercially confidential.

Weighing and Measuring Machines

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many new weighing and measuring machines have been submitted to his inspectors for type approval in each of the years 1979 to 1984, respectively, and what is the gross sum collected in each of those years in inspection fees.

Mr. Fletcher: The information available on weighing and measuring equipment submitted to the Department for pattern examination is as follows:

Number of Instruments submitted during year (excludes variants) and total income from new submissions and variant

Financial year	Number	£
1979-80	56	32,618
1980-81	28	88,795
1981-82	45	112,207
1982-83	89	137,290
1983-84	81	222,486

Software Products (Double Licensing)

Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the United States authorities about the problems of double licensing of software products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The United States authorities are fully aware of our views on the application of their re-export requirements to exports from the United Kingdom.

COCOM

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will publish the COCOM list.

Mr. Channon: I expect to be able in March to make and publish an Export of Goods (Control) Order which, when brought into force, will give effect to the new COCOM arrangements.

Fish and Chip Shops

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many fish and chip shops are recorded as having gone bankrupt since 1 May 1984.

Mr. Fletcher: I regret that this information is not available. Fish and chip shops would be included under "hotels and catering" in tables 2 and 3 of the article on insolvencies in British Business, 25 January 1985.

Rowntree Mackintosh, Edinburgh

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will receive a delegation representing the work force of the Rowntree Mackintosh factory in Edinburgh to discuss the proposed closure of the plant.

Mr. Tebbit: As the reception of such a delegation would be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, I have passed the hon. Member's request to him.

Electrical Equipment (Standards)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any proposals for the accreditation of organisations concerned with standards for electrical equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing import penetration for products of manufacturing industry for the year 1984 using 1984 imports as a numerator and 1983 production as a denominator.

Mr. Channon: The figures are not yet available.

Shipbuilding (Privatisation)

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions his Department has had with potential purchasers of privatised shipyards about possible Government financial support for maintaining after privatisation capacity utilisation at levels similar to those occurring prior to privatisation.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 28 January 1985, c. 46]: There have been no such discussions. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked British Shipbuilders to set in hand action to dispose of its warshipbuilding interests. The Government's intention is that, wherever possible, the yards will be sold to purchasers who intend to continue shipbuilding and who can demonstrate that they have the necessary skills and finance.

Radio Stations

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many licences have been granted for cellular radio base stations under the Telecommunications Act 1984; and how many of these are in the vicinity of the M25 motorway.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 30 January 1985, c. 215-16]: Two licences to operate the cellular radio telephone systems have been granted under the British Telecommunications Act 1981 and have effect as if granted under the Telecommunications Act 1984. A total of about 40 base stations will provide full coverage of the M25 motorway by early summer.

Space Agency

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the creation of an independent Space Agency for Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 30 January 1985, c. 216]: My hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology announced on 29 January 1985 that a British National Space Centre is to be set up to improve the development of space technology in the United Kingdom and to co-ordinate space policy more effectively.

ENVIRONMENT

Swans

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has any indication of the consequences of a decline in the swan population;

(2) when he expects to hear the results of the Nature Conservancy Council's research into swan deaths;

(3) what evidence he has of the decline of the swan population in various parts of the United Kingdom;

(4) what evidence he has that anglers are buying substitutes to lead weights; and what action he has taken and proposes to take to encourage the use of substitutes;

(5) if he has any evidence of any increase in the swan population anywhere in the United Kingdom;

(6) what steps, other than the substituting of lead weights for fishing, he is taking to (a) protect and (b) increase the swan population;

(7) what steps are being taken to remove lead shot from rivers and river banks.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Nature Conservancy Council held a meeting to review the position on lead poisoning of swans on 24 January. The mute swan population does not appear to be declining in overall numbers. A census conducted by the Wildfowl Trust in 1983 estimated the total number of mute swans in Britain to be about 19,000. This figure represents a 7 per cent. increase over a similar census in 1978.

However, there are marked regional variations in the figures. The following 14 counties — pre-1974 geographical boundaries — have shown a decrease of more than 10 per cent. over the period: Dorset, Glamorgan, Gloucester, Oxford, Huntingdon, Nottingham, Caernarvon, Dunbarton, Selkirk, Peebles, Midlothian, Argyll, Sutherland and the Outer Hebrides. On the other hand, significant increases have taken place in the southern and eastern counties of England, and in parts of northern England and Scotland.

Research indicates, however, that despite the overall increase in the population, in excess of 3,000 mute swans continue to die each year from lead poisoning by anglers' lead shot.

The meeting also examined the position regarding non-toxic alternatives to lead shot. Significant progress has been made in developing substitutes. At least two products have been available since the beginning of the 1984 fishing season and a number of others are in various stages of development. Anglers have been testing the alternatives, as a result of which modifications have already been made. Further trials of new and improved products are taking place. The manufacturers and representatives of the national angling bodies have agreed to join together in a working group under the chairmanship of the Nature Conservancy Council to consider what can be done to further refine and encourage the use of non-toxic alternatives.

In the meantime, spill-proof dispensers, in which lead-shot is now widely sold, have been developed to reduce the spillage of shot on river banks. Other equipment has also been developed for use by anglers to retrieve discarded line and shot from river banks.

The Nature Conservancy Council is now considering the detailed evidence presented at its review meeting, and will report any recommendations to Ministers in due course.

Buildings of Architectural or Historical Interest

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in view of the substantial increase in the number of buildings in the list of buildings of architectural or historical interest as a result of the current resurvey, he has any proposals to increase funds available to the district councils to meet claims for grant-aid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The purpose of the current survey is to identify buildings of outstanding architectural or historic interest. The size of the statutory list is expected to increase from 280,000 buildings in 1982 to over 400,000 when completed in 1987, though this does not necessarily imply the need for a pro rata increase in grant aid, much of which in any case comes from the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission. The levels of expenditure devoted to conservation by district councils is for them to decide in the light of their priorities and resources.

Local Government Act 1972

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions section 261 of the Local Government Act 1972, concerning remuneration of employees of existing local authorities outside Greater London, has been invoked; what were the circumstances on each occasion; and what was the result on each occasion.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Water Authorities

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the letters from him to the chairmen of the English water authorities referred to in his reply of 25 January, Official Report, column 555.

Mr. Gow: I am placing copies of the letters in the Library of the House.

Structure Plans

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report those structure plans submitted for approval to his Department over the past two years, indicating those for which an examination in public has already been held, together with those for which an examination in public is proposed and the date, where known, when each examination is expected to be held.

Mr. Macfarlane: The position is as indicated:

Local Authorities (Mineral Resources)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the work and future financing of the Natural Environment Research Council and role of the British Geological Survey and its assistance to local authorities over land, mineral resources and workings and onshore oil industry.

Mr. Brooke: I have been asked to reply.

The Natural Environment Research Council (NERC) will continue to receive a grant-in-aid from the Department's science budget, determined in the light of advice from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. This grant-in-aid is £65·9 million in 1984-85 and will be £67·3 million in 1985-86. The council also carries out research commissioned by Government Departments and other bodies, on the basis that the full economic cost of suchwork is borne by the commissioning body.

The British Geological Survey is one of the NERC's component institutes. As well as conducting research in the earth sciences, it provides advice to local authorities and Government Departments on geological matters including land structure, mineral resources and workings and the onshore oil industry. The NERC intends this service to continue.

Regional Emergency Committee

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if regional emergency committees will meet between 26 February and 16 March.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c. 279]: The answer should read:

There are no plans to hold meetings of the regional emergency committees between 26 February and 16 March.

GLC (Research Library's Database)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times his Department has used the Greater London council research library's Acompline on-line database; and what arrangements will be made to ensure that its users continue to receive this service in the event of the Greater London council's abolition.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c 281]: The joint library of the Departments of the Environment and of Transport used the Acompline on-line database 97 times during 1983 and 1984. No decision has yet been reached on the future of the Greater London research library and the services it provides. A more forthcoming attitude by the GLC towards discussing the implications of the Government's abolition proposals would greatly help to reduce uncertainty in this and other areas.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how far the temperature would have to fall in the north, north-west and Yorkshire and Humberside regions in the months of December, January and February in order to trigger special payments for pensioners under the severe weather allowance scheme.

Mr. Whitney: Single payments may be awarded to supplementary benefit claimants who have used more fuel than they have budgeted for because of a period of exceptionally severe weather. The table shows the average weekly temperature — the average of the mean daily temperatures over seven days—which would be needed to reach the "trigger point" at which the Chief Adjudication Officer considers the "exceptionally severe weather" condition in the regulations to be satisfied, for each of the five weather stations used for the north and north-west of England, Yorkshire and Humberside.

Weather station	Average weekly temperature necessary to reach "trigger point" (°C)
Boulmer (Northumberland)	−1·9
Carlisle	−2·6
Finningley (South Yorkshire)	−1·6
Leeming (North Yorkshire)	−3·5
Manchester	−1·8

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing (a) the administrative costs of paying supplementary benefit to the unemployed for the years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 and (b) the administrative costs of paying unemployment benefit over the same period.

Mr. Whitney: Administrative costs cannot be allocated precisely to individual benefits, but the following figures give a rough indication:

£ million

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Unemployment benefit	110	140	130	130	145
Supplementary benefit to the unemployed	175	235	290	330	350

Hypothermia

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people died of hypothermia in 1982, 1983 and 1984

Mr. John Patten: The available information is shown in the table.

Deaths with mention of hypothermia, 1982 to 1984: England and Wales

Year	Number
1982	671
1983	539
1984*	*455

* Figures for 1984 are for January to September only.

"Sport for Positive Health"

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which regional health authorities are sponsoring "Sport for Positive Health" projects; and how much they are spending on which schemes.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally.

Community Health Centres

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many community health centres are (a) in existence and (b) in the planning stage; how these are, or are to be, funded and staffed; how many clients are, or are to be, served; what facilities or services are, or will be, provided; and what is their relationship to other health and local authority services.

Mr. John Patten: The most recent (1983) figures show that health authorities have provided 1,093 health centres, with 29 more in the planning stage. The services provided at any centre will be those normally available from general medical practitioners contracted to a family practitioner committee who wish to practice there; and community health services provided by staff employed by the health authority concerned, to the extent that it feels appropriate in the light of local needs and resources. Accommodation is sometimes provided for the staff of local authority social service departments, but that will depend upon local arrangements. Information is not collected centrally about the number of people served by health centres. This will depend upon the number of general practitioners based at each centre, and the local organisation of other services provided there.

Amenity and Pay Beds

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the number of National Health Service amenity beds, deaths and discharges of patients and average daily occupancy, giving numbers and percentages, for each region for each of the last five years; (2) what is the number of authorised National Health Service pay beds, deaths and discharges of patients, average daily occupancy, giving numbers and percentages, for each region for each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Private Hospitals

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of private hospitals which offer acute surgical care and the number of beds and the occupancy rate for all facilities offering such care by region in each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is not available in the exact form requested. I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply when 1983 information is available centrally.

Incontinence Pads

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the responsibilities of health authorities with regard to the supply of incontinence pads to parents of children incontinent by reason of physical or mental disability; and if he will give a summary of any guidance his Department has given to health authorities concerning appropriate levels of supply.

Mr. John Patten: Health authorities are empowered to supply incontinence pads to parents of incontinent children where the children live in their own homes. The extent to which they do so will depend upon local consideration of service priorities in the light of available resources. No specific guidance has been issued to health authorities concerning appropriate levels of supply, as a nursing assessment would normally be made of the needs of an individual child.

Thornton View Hospital, Bradford

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients in Thornton View hospital, Bradford, have died between October 1984 and the latest available date.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally. The hon. Member may wish to seek information from the chairman of Bradford health authority.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from Bradford city council concerning Thornton View hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have had representations from the city solicitor who, I understand, was acting on the instructions of a sub-committee of Bradford city council, that the closure of the hospital should be delayed because population data used in the district health authority's plans were misleading. I have replied that I am satisfied that the new figures presented by the city council do not have any significant bearing on the decision, and that Bradford, with 45 per cent. more beds for elderly patients than the national average, will be able to provide satisfactory services to elderly people.

Dentists

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will show, for the year 1979 and for the most recent year available (i) the total number of dentists employed by, or under contract to, the National Health Service, (ii) the average income of a dentist under contract to the National Health Service, both in money and real terms and (iii) the total cost to the National Health Service of dentistry in money and real terms.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

General Practitioners

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will show, for 1979 and for the most recent year available (i) the total number of general practitioner doctors under contract to the National Health Service, (ii) the average earnings of a general practitioner under contract to the National Health Service, (iii) the average list of patients served by such a general practitioner and (iv) the total cost to the National Health Service of general practitioner services in money and real terms.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The total number of general medical practitioners — unrestricted principals — in England was 21,357 in 1979 and 23,254 in 1983, the latest year for which figures are available. Average list sizes of patients per doctor were 2,286 in 1979 and 2,116 in 1983. The average intended net income for general medical practitioners in 1979-80 was £12,867, and in 1983-84 was £20,160 from 1 April 1983 and £20,670 from 1 January 1984. The total cost in England to the National Health Service of general medical services, including pharmaceutical services, net of charges was £1,219·6 million in 1979-80 and £2,183·0 million in 1983-84 — an increase of 23 per cent. in real terms.

Heating Costs

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision is made under his Department's regulations relating to special help with heating costs when the winter weather is very cold for those who have made purchases of discounted bulk solid fuel in the preceding summer months for consumption in the subsequent winter.

Mr. Whitney: In addition to the regular weekly help with fuel costs available through the supplementary benefit scheme, the regulations provide for single payments to be awarded to supplementary benefit claimants who have used more fuel than they have budgeted for because of a period of exceptionally severe weather. It is for the independent adjudication authorities to decide whether in a particular case the claimant is entitled to a payment under these provisions and, if so, how much. I understand that the Chief Adjudication Officer takes the view that a claimant who has bought solid fuel in sufficient bulk to last through a normal winter but who has used more than expected because of a period of exceptionally severe weather and whose stocks are therefore used earlier than expected could be entitled to a single payment under these provisions. I also understand that he will be looking at the existing guidance in paragraphs 7426 to 7459 of the S Manual, a copy of which is in the Library, in the light of experience and will consider what further guidance should be given about entitlement of people who buy solid fuel in bulk.

Limited List Prescribing

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider prolonging the period during which consultation can take place with the medical profession, the pharmaceutical industry and organisations representing patients regarding his proposed limited list of prescribable drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Almost three months have been allowed for consultation. We regard this as adequate and have no plans to extend it.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish his final limited list of drugs following the completion of the consultation period; and if he will accompany the final list with an explanation of any changes made as compared with the draft list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We shall make an announcement covering the point raised by the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Voluntary and Private Residential Home

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the numbers of people aged over 65 years in local authority, voluntary and private residential homes each year since 1976 to 1984.

Mr. John Patten: The Department's publication "Statistics of Residential Accommodation for the Elderly and for Younger Physically Handicapped People at 31 March 1983 — England", a copy of which is in the Library, contains the information requested in respect of accommodation for the elderly for the years 1976 to 1983 inclusive. The publication "Homes and Hostels for the Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped at 31 March 1983 — England", which is also in the Library, contains parallel information for the accommodation in question but is limited to residents sponsored or supported by local authorities. Information is not available centrally on those not so supported or sponsored. The corresponding provisional information for the position at 31 March 1984 is as follows:

Type of Home	Total number of residents aged 65 or over in Homes for the Elderly/Disabled	Number of supported/sponsored residents aged 65 or over in homes for the:
		Elderly/Disabled	Mentally Ill	Mentally Handicapped
Local Authority	101,996	101,996	247	278
Voluntary	26,005	8,913	119	160
Private	52,675	1,394	72	88
Total	180,676	112,303	438	526

Post Neonatal Mortality

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what proposals he has, arising from the report on cot deaths, to ensure that parents and doctors are better informed about appropriate treatment for sick babies;

(2) what action he intends to take in the light of the statement in the report on cot deaths that many of the mothers whose babies died were heavy smokers, did not breast feed their babies and lived in poor housing and environmental conditions.

Mr. John Patten: The report of the DHSS-funded multicentre study of post-neonatal mortality has important implications and calls for a considered response by the professions as well as by the Department, which is holding a conference in March to promote a full discussion of the several issues raised. We hope that this will identify positive steps that can be taken in the fields of prevention and highlight areas for further research.

Cigarette Advertising and Sponsorship

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take to prevent a further renewal of current agreements on cigarette advertising and sponsorship.

Mr. John Patten: The Government will be reviewing the current voluntary agreements with the tobacco industry in due course.

Cigarette Smoking

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what new proposals he has to inform children of the dangers of cigarette smoking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Health Education Council, which is funded by the Government, has a substantial continuing programme concerned with alerting children to the health hazards of smoking. The work is carried forward through schools, the media, by special promotions such as the current "Pacesetters Don't Smoke" campaign and in other ways. A new television campaign, aimed at informing families as a whole of the special risks to health of cigarette smoking, is planned to start shortly. Research has been commissioned by the Government and by the Health Education Council with the intention of finding more effective ways of discouraging children from smoking.

Child Benefit

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to introduce a two-tier child benefit system involving a higher benefit for low income families and a taxed benefit for high income families.

Mr. Whitney: Child benefit is within the scope of the social security review which is now being completed. We hope to be in a position to announce any proposals for change in the course of the next few months.

AIDS (Nurses)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service nurses have contracted acquired immune deficiency syndrome resulting from close contact with hospital patients suffering from this disease.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Dysentery

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of dysentery have been recorded during the last five years in the west midlands region; and what proportion of the number of cases on a national level these represent.

Mr. John Patten: The information is shown in the table.

*Number of notifications of dysentery in the West Midlands region and England and Wales, with West Midlands as a percentage of England and Wales, 1980 to 1984

Year	West Midlands	England and Wales	Per cent.
1980	457	2,709	16·9
1981	446	3,401	13·1
1982	749	2,850	26·3
1983	395	5,004	7·9
1984*	563	7,697	7·3

* Provisional figures.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take to combat the increase in the level of dysentery cases in the north of England; and what resources he will make available to northern district and regional health authorities to improve hygiene standards on housing estates in those areas worst affected.

Mr. John Patten: Higher levels of incidence of dysentery have been reported from two locations in the Yorkshire and Humberside region. Experts in infectious diseases from the Government financed communicable disease surveillance centre (CDSC) have been in touch with the medical officers for environmental health who have responsibility for infectious disease control in these locations and have offered advice and guidance on control measures as appropriate. The CDSC is continuing to monitor the situation.

High standards of personal hygiene, including adequate handwashing with normal soap and water, is the key to the control of dysentery.

Food Supply Wastage (Hospitals)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what investigations he plans to conduct into the levels of provision of hot and cold foods served to patients and the quantities of food supply wastage within National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. John Patten: It is the responsibility of individual health authorities to ensure that they provide palatable and nutritious food for their patients economically and without undue waste of food. We plan shortly to publish the report of the National Health Service scrutiny on the cost of catering and shall be calling for action from health authorities to review their catering services and seek a reduction of food wastage.

Hospital Admissions and Operations

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what emergency procedures he plans to adopt to enable hospital admissions and operations to take place without hindrance in the event of extreme cold weather conditions.

Mr. John Patten: It is the responsibility of health authorities to manage and supervise hospital and specialist surgical services to meet local need. Arrangements for admissions to NHS hospitals for both medical and surgical procedures are planned to take into account circumstances which would significantly affect demand. We would expect extremes of weather conditions, epidemics, major accidents and natural disasters to be amongst the factors taken into account.

Nursing Staff

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of nursing staff in mental illness and mental handicap hospitals is, respectively, registered, enrolled, students, pupils or other categories.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is given in the table.

	England 30 September 1983
	Mental Illness Hospitals‡ (per cent.)	Mental Handicap Hospitals‡ (per cent.)
All nursing staff*	100	100
First level (Registered) nurse†	35	25
Second level (Enrolled) nurse†	20	17
Students	12	8
Pupils	4	4
Other nursing staff	29	46

* The figures are based on whole-time equivalent numbers including tutorial staff but excluding administrative and agency staff.

† Includes first level nurses with and without the RMN or RNMH qualification and second level nurses with and without the EN(M) and EN(MH) qualification.

‡ Includes staff in mental and mental handicap units and wards within non-psychiatric hospitals.

Prescriptions

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the average number of prescriptions per patient a year within the National Health Service in each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The following is the information available:

Year	*Number of items dispensed per head
1979	6·6
1980	6·6
1981	6·5
1982	6·8
1983	6·8

* The number of NHS prescribed items dispensed by retail pharmacists, appliance contractors, dispensing doctors and for personal administration by prescribing doctors in the calendar year divided by the number of patients registered on NHS general practitioner lists as at 30 September in that year.

Drug Prescribing Levels

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies he intends to conduct to examine the correlation of drug prescribing levels with delays in hospital treatment for patients within the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

General Practitioner Surgeries

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he intends to make available to general practitioner surgeries to improve ease of access to premises, consulting room facilities, internal waiting areas and seating and standards of lighting, heating and ventilation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Statutory Sick Pay

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what responses he has received from the British Medical Association, the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress to the consultation paper issued by the Department of Health and Social Security on proposals to extend statutory sick pay for employees from eight weeks to 28 weeks.

Mr. Whitney: No responses from the British Medical Association and the Confederation of British Industry have yet been received to the consultation paper. Draft comments have been received from the Trades Union Congress. The TUC comments state that it does not oppose in principle the further extension of the coverage of statutory sick pay. It proposes that the rates of statutory sick pay should be increased and makes a number of comments on the individual points raised in the consultation paper. These will be carefully considered along with all the other representations received.

Abortions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown of the total number of abortions performed on women resident in England and Wales by the following gestational ages of the foetus: under nine weeks, nine weeks, 10 weeks, 11 weeks, 12 weeks, 13 weeks, 14 weeks, 15 to 19 weeks, 20 to 23 weeks, over 24 weeks in each of the following years: 1969, 1975, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is shown in the table.

* Provisional.
From 1969 to 1980 gestation is calculated as the number of completed weeks between last menstrual period and date of operation. In March 1981 a new notification form was introduced which seeks a direct statement of gestation and the basis on which it is derived.
Not stated gestation is included in "All" gestation

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown by number of previous children of those women resident in England and Wales upon whom abortions were performed in each of the following years; 1969, 1970, 1974, 1978, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is as follows:

Number of legally induced abortions for all women resident in England and Wales by the number of previous live and stillborn children for 1969, 1970, 1974, 1978 and 1980 to 1983

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown of the number of abortions performed in England and Wales on resident women according to the statutory grounds on which those abortions were performed in each of the following years: 1969, 1970, 1974, 1978, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and what was the total number of abortions performed on such women in each of those years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is shown in the table.

Abortions performed in England and Wales on resident women, 1969, 1970, 1974, 1978, 1980-83 by statutory grounds

Year	Statutory grounds

Notes:

Statutory grounds as listed in schedule 2 to the Abortion Regulations 1968

1. Risk to life of woman.
2. Risk of injury to physical or mental health of woman.
3. Risk of injury to physical or mental health of existing child(ren).
4. Substantial risk of child being born abnormal.
5. In emergency—to save life of woman.
6. In emergency—to prevent grave permanent injury to physical or mental health of woman.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the abortions performed on women resident in England and Wales of foetuses aged (a) under 20 weeks, (b) 20 to 23 weeks, and (c) 24 and over weeks were carried out in (i) National Health Service premises and (ii) non-National Health Service premises in the latest year for which figures are available; and what this figure is as a percentage of the total number of abortions in each category.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is shown in the following table:

Legal abortions by gestation; numbers and percentages by category of premises, 1983 residents of England and Wales

Category of premises	All	Gestation (weeks) Under 20	20-23	24 and over

Not stated gestation is included in All gestation.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown according to the statutory grounds on which abortions were performed on women resident in England and Wales where the foetus was aged 20 to 23 weeks and 24 weeks or more; and what each of these figures is as a percentage of the number of abortions of foetuses of these ages in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest available information is shown in the following table.

Abortions by gestation and statutory grounds for England and Wales residents, 1982

	Gestation (weeks) 20-23 Number	20-23 Percentage	24 and over Number	24 and over Percentage

4. Substantial risk of child being abnormal.
5. In emergency—to save life of woman.
6. In emergency—to prevent grave permanent injury to physical or mental health of woman.

Live Births (Statistics)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state (a) the total number of live births, (b) the total number of illegitimate live births, (c) the ratio of live births to abortions, (d) the number of illegitimate births as a percentage of all live births for women who are aged (i) over 20 years and (ii) under 20 years, the resident in England and Wales in each of the following years; 1967, 1969, 1974, 1978, 1980, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The figures requested are shown in the table.

England and Wales

Year	Total live births*	Total illegitimate births*	Ratio of live births to abortions†	Illegitimate births as percentage of all live births
Women aged under 20
1967	84,542	21,642	—	25·6

Employment Benefit Offices (Terminals and Microcomputers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why a United States computer company was awarded a contract to supply terminals and microcomputers to employment benefit offices.

Mr. Whitney: The award of contract followed a competitive procurement exercise conducted in accordance with European Community directives and the general agreement on tariffs and trade code on Government procurements. It was therefore open equally to British and foreign companies to apply and be considered in the normal way.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 4 February 1985

HOME DEPARTMENT

Official Secrets Act

59. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to repeal section 2 of the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Terrorist Offences (Statistics)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average period between remand and trial for prisoners refused bail and charged with offences related to terrorism in Great Britain in 1984; and how many prisoners were held in this manner.

Mr. Mellor: The only information which is readily available concerning prisoners charged with terrorist-type offences relates to prisoners who are currently in prison custody in England and Wales and in category A. It does not cover prisoners who have been released or downgraded.

In 1984, 14 prisoners were first received in custody charged with terrorist-type offences and placed in category A. As at 25 January 1985 none of the trials of these men had been completed.

Day Centres (Attendance)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many probation orders had conditions of attendance at a day centre attached since the Criminal Justice Act 1982 conditions came into force.

Mr. Mellor: Figures reported by the probation service and published in table 2.8 of "Probation Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" are available only for the first half of 1983; owing to industrial action by some probation officers corresponding figures are not available for the second half of 1983 and will not be available for 1984. It is estimated that some 500-600 probation orders imposed in the period 31 January-31 December 1983 included a requirement to attend a day centre.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) murderers of police and prison officers, (b) sexual or sadistic murderers of children and (c) people who have committed murder by shooting in the furtherance of theft were in prison at the most recent convenient date.

Mr. Mellor: I will reply as soon as possible.

Probation Orders

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many probation orders were made in the years ended December 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (tables 7.1 and 7.2 of the volume for 1983, Cmnd. 9349). Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Drugs Misuse

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much heroin, cocaine, marijuana and other illicit drugs were seized by police, customs or other officers during the calendar year 1984; and if he will give this information together with comparable figures for the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: I understand from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the latest figures of seizures by Customs officials are as given in the table below. Information on seizures by the police in the years 1979 to 1983 is given in Table 1.3 of "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs, United Kingdom, Supplementary Tables 1983", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House; corresponding figures for 1984 will be available later in the year.

Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the provisions of the Repatriation of Prisoners Act will come into operation.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to make an order bringing the Act into operation before the end of March. The United Kingdom will then ratify the Council of Europe convention of the transfer of sentenced persons. The convention will come into force three months after three member states of the council have ratified it; so far only one has done so.

European Assembly

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members of the European Assembly who represent constituencies in the United Kingdom are not citizens of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not recorded.

Television Licences (Evasion)

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prosecutions took place for television licence evasion in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984;

(2) how many people were found guilty of evading television licences in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of prosecutions and convictions were as follows:

	prosecutions	convictions
1981	67,803	67,299
1982	81,247	80,979
1983	94,111	93,827
1984	109,143	108,830

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much revenue resulted from fines paid for television licence evasion in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I regret that information in respect of revenue resulting from fines for particular types of offence is not available centrally.

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation that will allow compensation to be given to the British Broadcasting Corporation for revenue lost due to television licence evasion.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so.

Probation Officers (Reports)

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases in each of the last three years probation officers have refused to provide courts with social inquiry reports on the ground that the offender had been convicted of a political offence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available, but I am not aware that this is an issue which has caused significant difficulties for the courts. The recent instance which I believe my hon. Friend has in mind was an isolated one, in which a satisfactory solution has been found.

Charities

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce amendments to the law relating to charities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to introduce amendments to the law relating to charities but he is keeping the situation under review.

Cruelty to Animals Act 1876

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is now his Department's latest position with regard to the updating and modernisation of the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876.

Mr. Mellor: We shall introduce legislation as soon as Parliamentary time permits. We have been refining some of our proposals and will announce details shortly.

Experiments on Living Animals

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the reasons for the increase in experiments on living animals in 1983 over 1982 of 23 per cent. in household chemicals experiments.

Mr. Mellor: Experiments with household substances are performed for the purpose of safety testing. The increase in the number of experiments in 1983 reflects a greater need for such tests. The total number of experiments with household substances, however, remains a very small proportion of the total, ie 17,153 out of 3·6 million in 1983 (less than half of one per cent.).

Abortion

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offences were recorded for procuring illegal abortions in each of the following years: 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1982 and 1983; in how many of these cases prosecutions were proceeded with; and how many convictions resulted in each of those years.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" under offence classification 14; in the volume for 1983 statistics of offences recorded by the police are given in table 2.8 of Cmnd. 9349 and statistics of persons proceeded against and found guilty are given in Supplementary tables, vol. 1, table S1.1(A) for magistrates' courts and vol. 2, table S2.1(A) for the Crown court. Figures for the earlier years specified are given in the following table.

Offences of procuring an illegal abortion recorded by the police, persons proceeded against and persons found guilty England and Wales

	Offences recorded by the police	Persons proceeded against at magistrates' courts	Persons found guilty at all courts

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will list in the Official Report the religious faiths represented by the eight ministers accredited to visit inmates at Winson Green prison in Birmingham.

Mr. Mellor: The eight visiting ministers currently accredited at Winson Green prison in Birmingham represent Buddhists, Christian Scientists, Jews, Muslims, Pentecostal Church, Quakers, Salvation Army and Sikhs.

Assisted Visits Scheme

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Giros and tavel warrants were issued under the assisted visits scheme during the financial year 1983-84.

Mr. Mellor: The Department of Health and Social Security, which administers the assisted visits scheme on behalf of the Home Office, made 29,027 Giro transactions and issued 28,710 travel warrants during 1983-84.

Women Prisoners

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the numbers of women in prison at the latest available date who had their children with them; and what were their location, the ages of the children and the sentence being served by the mother and the offence she had committed or was alleged to have committed.

Mr. Mellor: On 1 February 1985, there were 21 women in custody with their children. The establishment, age of children and sentence details of the mothers are as follows:

Establishment	Age of Child	Mother's Offence	Mother's Sentence
Askham Grange (11)	2 months	Theft	15 months
	3 months	Obtaining by deception	19 months
	4 months	Theft	12 months
	6 months	Obtaining by false instrument	3 years
	6 months	Deception	6 months
	6 months	Deception	6 months
	8 months	Theft	6 months
	11 months	Illegal importation of drugs	3 years
	12 months	Robbery	2 years
	13 months	Illegal importation of drugs	15 months
	15 months	Deception	18 months
East Sutton Park (1)	6 months	Theft	12 months
Holloway (4)	6 weeks	Illegal importation of drugs	20 months
	6 weeks	Supplying drugs	18 months
	3½ months	Illegal importation of drugs	Trial
	4½ months	Shoplifting	28 days
Styal (5)	1 month	Possession and supplying of drugs	9 months
	2 months	Possession of drugs	12 months
	3 months	Illegal importation of drugs	2 years
	3 months	Illegal importation of drugs	6 months
	5 months	Illegal importation of drugs	18 months

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors are taken into account when deciding to separate a child from its mother who is in prison.

Mr. Mellor: The prison department's policy on this matter is set out in circular instruction 51/1983, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. If the hon. Member has any particular point in mind I would be glad to look into it.

Horses

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek powers to prevent suffering to horses tethered out in the open without proper food and shelter.

Mr. Mellor: No. It is already an offence under the Protection of Animals Act 1911 to cause unnecessary suffering to a domestic or captive animal.

LD 50 Poisoning Test

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek powers to prohibit the use of the LD 50 poisoning test.

Mr. Mellor: The Government welcome the growing recognition by the scientific community and regulatory bodies that formal LD 50 tests are increasingly not necessary. Where they are shown to be necessary, however, they will continue to be allowed, subject to strict controls. Wherever possible a limit test or some other alternative method should be employed.

Advisory Committee on Animal Experiments

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will reconstitute the Home Office advisory committee on animal experiments to exclude those with any involvement in, or connection with, vivisection.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek powers to prohibit the use of animals in tobacco and alcohol research.

Mr. Mellor: No. Work related to tobacco and alcohol has implications for pharmacological and medical research which go beyond the needs of those who actually drink and smoke; and its continuance, subject to proper controls, is necessary for those purposes.

There is very little research into tobacco and its substitutes — only 2,659 experiments in 1983 which made it the smallest research category. Work on alcohol is indistinguishable from other medical research. As it is one of our major medical and social problems it would be difficult to stop it on the grounds of triviality; and, like tobacco, it has consequences for those who do not consume it which undermines the argument that its ills are entirely self-induced and should not be mitigated at the expense of living animals.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek powers to prohibit the use of animals to test cosmetics and toiletries.

Mr. Mellor: No. The Government have a duty to comply with the provisions of EC directives and to ensure that safe products are marketed. The number of cosmetics and toiletries tests represents less than half of 1 per cent. of all those performed, and has declined steadily in recent years. We welcome that decline. Under the new legislation proposed in the White Paper "Scientific Procedures of Living Animals" (Cmnd. 8883), however, all applications for project licences to test cosmetics and toiletries will automatically be referred to the proposed Animal Procedures Committee for advice as to whether the tests should be permitted.

ENERGY

National Coal Board (Finances)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give, in a similar form to that used in his answer of 6 July 1984 to the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) the income and expenditure of the National Coal Board for 1983-84, indicating the loss and his Departments' level of subsidy.

Mr. David Hunt: In 1983-84 the income of the National Coal Board was £5,028 million (including adjustments for taxation, extraordinary items and exchange losses). Of this, social grants were £270 million. Expenditure in the year including interest was £5,903 million. Deficit grant was £875 million.

These figures, which are taken from the NCB report and accounts, are not directly comparable with those given in the answer of 6 July 1984, due to changes in definition. Nor do they cover the full extent of Exchequer payments in support of the coal industry, some of which do not pass through the books of the National Coal Board.

Mr. Ian MacGregor

Mr. Holye asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library a copy of the full text of the compensation agreement between Her Majesty's Government and Lazard Frères for the release of Mr. Ian MacGregor to become chairman of the National Coal Board.

Mr. David Hunt: No. I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply of 30 October 1984 at columns 879-80.

Libyan Oil

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy what have been the amounts of Libyan oil imported into the United Kingdom, both in quantity and as a proportion of total oil imported, in each of the years from 1979 to date.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Information about the amounts of oil which have been imported into the United Kingdom is provided in "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom", which is available in the Library of the House.

Sleipner Gas

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will undertake not to reject the Sleipner deal until his revised estimates of gas reserves on the United Kingdom continental shelf are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: In considering the proposed purchase of Sleipner gas, I shall take account of all relevant factors.

Coal Industry (Assets)

Mr. Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if there have been any discussions between his Department and the National Coal Board regarding proposals to sell any of the principal assets of the coal industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government have no plans to privatise coal mines, and no discussions of any such proposals have taken place between my Department and the NCB.

Nuclear Fuel Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, in the light of the European collaborative agreement on fast breeder reactors, he will propose that the creation of the European nuclear fuel reprocessing plant should be at Dounreay in Caithness: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend intends to make a statement on this matter in due course.

Thermal Energy

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the definition of thermal energy generation employed by his Department or the agencies sponsored by it; and if he will explain how the thermal energy generation figures are determined.

Mr. David Hunt: This Department does not use the expression "thermal energy generation": the Department and the various electricity undertakings use a number of definitions for the description of electricity generation in thermal power stations, depending on the context. The terms used in published statistics are usually defined in the publications in which they appear.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Agricultural Production

57. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the Overseas Development Administration funds is spent on raising agricultural production in developing countries.

Mr. Raison: In 1983, the latest year for which the relevant figures are available, total aid programme expenditure was £1,170 million, of which £1,034 million can be allocated by sector. Of this latter figure, an estimated 26 per cent. (or about £267 million) was spent on bilateral or multilateral aid activities aimed at raising agricultural production. Aid to other sectors, for example, roads, may well also help increase agricultural production.

Agricultural Development

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what conveniently available figures he has for that part of the United Kingdom long-term aid programme to agriculture in developing countries which is designed to make developing countries more self-sufficient.

Mr. Raison: There is no separate British aid programme for agricultural development. Most aid for this and other economic sectors is provided under individual country programmes. The following table provides details of expenditure (for the three latest available years) on bilateral project aid by detailed sector, and on other identifiable bilateral or multilateral aid benefiting agriculture. All such aid is designed to improve developing countries' self-sufficiency either directly through improved food production or indirectly through improved national incomes and greater foreign exchange earnings. Other projects, for instance roads, may have a significant bearing on agricultural development.

It is not possible to give figures for manpower and training aid to agriculture which is designed to make countries more self-sufficient.

Equally, Britain's contributions to the EDF, IDA, Regional Development Banks and the UNDP will be used in part for agricultural self-sufficiency, but there are no figures available.

South Pacific (Cyclones)

58. Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to assist south Pacific countries affected by recent cyclones.

Mr. Raison: Within 24 hours of each cyclone we made cash grants for relief aid, of £50,000 to Fiji and about £43,000 to Vanuatu. I have also authorised an allocation of up to £700,000 for rehabilitation of key services in Fiji.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Judicial Review

52. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General how many appeals against the refusal of leave to apply for judicial review were heard, allowed and dismissed by the Court of Appeal during the years 1980 to 1984, respectively.

The Attorney-General: I regret that no figures are available for 1980 to 1982. In 1983, 27 appeals were heard. 21 were dismissed, three were allowed but the applications were subsequently withdrawn, and no order was made in three cases. In 1984 35 appeals were heard, 31 were dismissed and four allowed, of which in one case the application was withdrawn, one dismissed and two are still pending.

Official Secrets Act

53. Mr. Winnick asked the Attorney-General how many prosecutions he has initiated under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act in the last two years.

The Attorney-General: Since 4 Februrary 1983 I have authorised eight such prosecutions.

Terrorists (Evidence)

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General how many people have been convicted on the evidence of converted terrorist witnesses; in how many cases this evidence was corroborated by other evidence, other than the evidence of another converted terrorist; and in how many cases the evidence of the converted terrorist constituted the sole evidence of the existence of the crime itself.

The Attorney-General: In so far as the question relates to the evidence of accomplices in trials for scheduled offences, the number of persons who were either convicted or pleaded guilty in consequence of evidence given by such accomplices is as follows:

Year	Number of persons
1982	4
1983	69
1984	11

In 1984 the convictions of 14 of the persons tried in 1983 were quashed on appeal to the Court of Appeal.

There is no comprehensive record of, and it is not now feasible to identify without disproportionate cost, the matters which may have been before the court for the purposes of individual charges or whether they were capable of constituting corroboration.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General how many people currently await trial on the evidence of converted terrorists; what proportion of these persons have been refused bail; and what is the average period of remand for which persons detained without bail have been held to date after being charged on the evidence of a converted terrorist irrespective of whether that person has yet been brought to trial.

The Attorney-General: There are at present 46 persons awaiting trial whose prosecution has been directed by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland and in respect of whom the chief constable has furnished evidence which includes the evidence of an alleged accomplice. Of these 46 persons, 25 have been admitted to bail, one did not apply for bail and 20 have been refused bail. Of the 20 persons who have been refused bail, five have been in custody since July 1983, three since August 1983, nine since October 1983 and the remaining three since February, March and April 1984 respectively.

Land Registry Fees

Mr. Murphy asked the Attorney-General if he has any plans to reduce Land Registry fees; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: It is intended to reduce the fees on dealings and first registrations and to exempt some services from fees altogether with effect from 1 June.

Jury vetting

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General if he will name the cases tried since 1 August 1980 in which jury vetting has occurred, and specify the offences charged and the results of the trials.

The Attorney-General: Jury vetting has occurred in the cases detailed in the following table:

Name(s) of accused	Offence(s) charged	Venue and date of commencement of trial	Result
Brian Keenan Robert Campbell Margaret Parrett Jacqueline O'Malley Richard Glenholmes Christine Cambell Gerard Tuite Robert Storey	Conspiracy to effect escape from prison Firearms offences	Central Criminal Court on 17 March 1981	5 defendants convicted
Antonio Sanchez and Luis Garcia	Sections 1 and 7 of the Officials Secrets Act 1911	Central Criminal Court on 9 June 1982	Both convicted
Hugh G. Hambleton	Section 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911	Central Criminal Court on 29 November 1982	Convicted
John McCombe	Conspiracy to cause explosions. Possession of explosive/firearms	Central Criminal Court on 9 May 1983	Convicted
Michael Bettaney	Section 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911	Central Criminal Court on 10 April 1984	Convicted
Clive Ponting	Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911	Central Criminal Court on 28 January 1985	Case proceeding
Khaled Mansoor Mohammed Shleback Khalifi Arouzoz Abu Shnayb	Sections 2 and 3 of the Explosive Substances Act 1883	Manchester Crown Court on 4 February 1985	Case proceeding

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General whether, since 1 August 1980, jury vetting has been approved in any case in which national security was not involved, or in which the jury was not asked to sit in camera.

The Attorney-General: Since 1 August 1980 jury vetting has been authorised in five cases which did not or do not involve matters of national security. In each case the alleged offences were of a terrorist nature and the grant of authority accorded with paragraph 4 of the guidelines which I published on that day. In each case where authority was based upon consideration of national security part of the evidence was taken in camera. Two of the five cases have yet to come to trial.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General how many records have been forwarded to him in accordance with paragraph 12 of his guidelines on jury checks (as amended in July 1980); and if he will make a statement as to (a) how many jurors are referred to in those records and (b) the use made by counsel of the information passed to him.

The Attorney-General: Five reports have been made by the Director of Public Prosecutions to the Attorney-General in accordance with paragraph 12 of the guidelines. A total of 10 jurors were referred to in these reports. Of these, three were challenged by the Crown and one was challenged by the defence as a result of information passed to it in consequence of the report in that case.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General whether any person has been excluded from a jury by approved jury vetting on the grounds of his actual or suspected membership of a political party, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament or the National Council for Civil Liberties; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. and learned Member to paragraph 5 of the guidelines published on 1 August 1980, which sets out the circumstances in which the holding of extreme political views may make it desirable to exclude an individual from jury service in certain exceptional cases of public importance.

Membership of a particular political party or the organisations referred to by the hon. Member does not constitute grounds for challenging a potential juror.

PRIME MINISTER

Foreign Exchange Markets (American Intervention)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether she asked the President of the United States for American intervention in the foreign exchange markets to support the sterling exchange rate.

The Prime Minister: Discussions between Heads of Government remain confidential.

Manufactures

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether the Government will appoint a committee of inquiry to consider why imports of manufactures are rising faster than exports.

The Prime Minister: No. Trends in trade in manufactured goods are kept under regular review by the Department of Trade and Industry. In addition, trade in manufactured goods with the EC has recently been considered by the House of Commons Trade and Industry Committee and the trade balance in manufactured goods is currently the subject of an inquiry by the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase in the unit value and volume of imported manufactures since 1970 and 1978, respectively.

The Prime Minister: The information is as follows:

Imports of manufactures

Percentage changes over periods	Unit value indices	Volume indices
1970-1984	+336	+194
1978-1984	+52	+47

Chemical Warfare

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether it was with her authority that Mr. Bernard Ingham contacted Independent Television News during the evening of Wednesday 9 January about coverage of the Government's attitude towards British manufacturing of a chemical warfare retaliatory capability.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Ingham acts in accordance with the duties of his office.

Channel Crossing

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if her discussions with President Mitterand on a possible Channel tunnel and road link produced a common position as to the side of the road on which motorists would drive in any such road tunnel; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have not discussed this question with the French President.

GCHQ Cheltenham

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether there has been any change in the positive vetting procedures carried out with respect to employees at the Government communications headquarters, Cheltenham.

The Prime Minister: As a result of its investigations into the case of Geoffrey Arthur Prime, the Security Commission recommended, and the Government subsequently accepted, a number of improvements to the positive vetting procedures used by GCHQ and other intelligence and security agencies. Changes have been made to implement these recommendations.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister why staff at the Government communications headquarters, Cheltenham, have been questioned about their attitudes to herself as part of the positive vetting procedure.

The Prime Minister: Positive vetting investigators have discretion, in the course of interviews with subjects under investigation, to discuss and to put questions on topics of current political interest with a view to ascertaining whether the subject has, or may be likely to have, extreme views or associations of a kind which might suggest that he or she would not be suitable for employment in a post which required regular and constant access to highly classified information, the improper disclosure of which could be damaging to the security of the state. Such questions have no other purpose than that, and the expression of views which may not coincide with those of the Government of the day has no bearing on or relevance to an investigation unless it appears to the investigator to go beyond the normal expression of dissent in a parliamentary democracy.

All that being said, I do not think it necessary or appropriate for investigators to put questions of the kind suggested by the hon. Member. If such questions have been put, it is without my knowledge or consent, and I have given instructions for my views to be made clear to the investigators concerned.

Falkland Islands and South Georgia

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government have sought outside legal advice as to the comparative validity of the United Kingdom's constitutional and territorial claims to the Falkland Islands and South Georgia, respectively; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Communications between the Government and legal advisers are confidential and it would not be in accordance with the practice in matters such as this to disclose the source of the advice which the Government have received.

The Government have stated on numerous occasions that they have no doubt about British sovereignty over the Falkland Islands or the Falkland Islands Dependencies.

Plutonium

Mr. Robertson asked the Prime Minister if the statement made by the right hon. Member for Kinross and West Perthshire on 21 April 1964, Official Report, column 1098, regarding the use of civil plutonium in the United Kingdom and the use by the United States Government of civil plutonium received from the United Kingdom, still represents the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

The Prime Minister: Her Majesty's Government have no plans for using plutonium derived from the United Kingdom's civil nuclear programmes for defence purposes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy informed Parliament of the United States' policy in answer to a question from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 2 July 1984 at column 36.

Ministerial Cars

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister who pays the penalties imposed on ministerial cars which have committed parking offences.

The Prime Minister: If the offences are related to Departmental business the cost of the penalty is currently met by the Government car service.

Correspondence

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will place in the Official Report a copy of her letter to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley of 29 January.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Dear Mr. Foulkes,

Thank you for your letter of 11 January about the licence granted to Firstland Oil and Gas plc for onshore oil prospecting on the Falklands. The granting of this licence was confirmed on 23 July 1984 by Mr. Ray Whitney, then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, in reply to a Parliamentary Question. A subsequent letter from Tim Renton, his successor, to Mr. Tam Dalyell about the details of the contract was published in Hansard on 25 October 1984.

You asked why the matter was "solely for the Falkland Islands Government". The granting of the licence falls within the powers of the Civil Commissioner under the Falkland Islands Mining Ordinance. The Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary has the power only to approve the terms and conditions and the period of validity of the licence. Such approval was given.

You also asked about the resources of the Falkland Islands Government to assess applications for oil and gas prospecting in the Falklands. The Falkland Islands Government can call on the full resources of Her Majesty's Government, by means of consultation with the Department of Energy through the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

As for the date of establishment of Firstland Oil and Gas plc, the company was established in May 1984. I understand that it then took over all the assets of Campatou, the foreign-based company to which you referred, which has been engaged in oil exploration since 1981, principally in Texas and Oklahoma in the United States. Lest there should be any misunderstanding I should emphasise that Firstland is incorporated in the UK, and that its directors are British nationals with experience in oil and gas exploration. Firstland has an option to buy land owned by Falkland Islands Properties, which as you say is registered in Jersey. The prospecting rights of Firstland were granted to it by the licence from the Falkland Islands Government.

You state that Firstland's operations in the Falklands are being conducted by their subsidiary company Campatou. I understand that the only operation so far carried out under the licence is a survey conducted in November and December last year by a British geologist employed by one of the leading British companies active in this field, and that Campatou has not been involved in any way.

You asked finally what guarantee there was that revenue from a successful oil strike would accrue to the Falklands or to the UK. The provisions of the Falkland Islands Mining (Mineral and Oil) Regulations ensure that revenue would accrue to the Falkland Islands Government to which, under the terms of the licence granted to Firstland, rent (and any royalties due in respect of oil or gas extracted) are payable.

Yours sincerely,

Margaret Thatcher

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will deposit in the Library a copy of the Falkland Islands Mining (Minerals and Oil) Regulations.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what is (a) the yearly rent and (b) the rate of royalties payable on oil extracted, imposed in the licence granted to Firstland Oil and Gas plc.

The Prime Minister: As stipulated in the Falkland Islands Mining (Mineral Oil) Regulations 1964, the licence provides for an annual rent for each square mile of the licensed area at the following rates:

	Rent
1st year of initial term	50 pence
2nd year of initial term	£1.00
3rd year of initial term	£1.50

	Rent
4th year of initial term	£1.75
1st year of renewal	£2.00
2nd year of renewal	£2.25
3rd year of renewal	£2.50

It also provides for a royalty of 12½ per cent. of the value of all crude oil won and saved and of all casinghead petroleum spirit recovered by Firstland Oil and Gas plc from the licensed area; and a royalty of 5 per cent of the value of all natural gas produced and sold from the licensed area. The rent paid in the relevant year is deducted from the amount of royalities so payable.

Press Briefings

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister if she will give details of the regular arrangements under which she, or her officials, brief journalists each week; and if she will give details of the arrangements whereby her ministerial colleagues, or their officials, regularly brief journalists.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy to arrange for the preparation of an official public record of any part of briefings with journalists given by her, her ministerial colleagues, or their officials, which are conducted on an attributable basis.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister what representations Ministers have received from parliamentary journalists seeking briefings from them, or their officials, on an attributable basis.

The Prime Minister: I am not aware of any. My office has, however, received a report of the parliamentary lobby journalists' inquiry into lobby practice. This recommended enabling Ministers, among others, to speak on the record in a lobby briefing if that is mutually agreed. My colleagues and I have taken note of this opportunity.

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister if she will instruct all Ministers who brief journalists that such briefings should be conducted on an attributable basis and that all briefings held by departmental officials should be conducted on the same basis.

The Prime Minister: No.

Information Officers

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister what is the total number of officials in her Office and in Government Departments who are designated as information officers, or who are primarily concerned with giving information to the media; and what is the total cost, including salaries, of those officials.

The Prime Minister: In all Government Departments there are currently 998 staff in the information officer group and 58 associated senior staff in the open structure. Their annual costs are estimated to be £26·9 million, including salaries, and overheads for accommodation and common services.

Information officers are engaged on a wide variety of duties including press office work, Government publicity at home and abroad, and internal information. There are no central records of the number of staff in other grades whose duties involve giving information to the media.

Five members of staff in my office have responsibilities for giving information to the media.

Parliamentary Questions (Forestry)

Mr. Dewar asked the Prime Minister if she will list the matters on which (a) the Secretary of State for Scotland, (b) the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, (c) the Secretary of State for Wales and (d) the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, respectively, answer parliamentary questions on matters relating to forestry.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Scotland, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Wales excercise their responsibilities for forestry matters in relation to Scotland, England and Wales respectively. General policy and other questions relating to Great Britain as a whole are normally answered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland deals with all matters relating to forestry in Northern Ireland.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Natural Environment Research Council (Chairmanship)

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what arrangements he proposes to make for the future chairmanship of the Natural Environment Research Council.

Mr. Brooke: The Department has appointed a firm of consultants, Messrs. John Stork and Partners, to help in the selection of a chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council from 1 October 1985. My right hon. Friend hopes to be in a position to announce the name of the individual concerned in the summer.

Alpha Research

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement giving conveniently approximate figures as to how many alpha research projects were rejected in 1984 by the Natural Environment Research Council.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that 157 research grant applications graded alpha were rejected by the Natural Environment Research Council in the calendar year 1984. This represents 58 per cent. of the total number of grant applications (270) which were graded alpha.

Educational Needs (Statements)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children in ordinary schools have statements of their educational needs as required under the Education Act 1981.

Mr. Dunn: I am writing to the hon. Member.

Value Added Tax (Publications)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what assessment he has made of the implications of the imposition of value added tax on books and other publications on (a) public library usage and (b) book provision;

(2) what assessment he has made of the implications of the imposition of value added tax on the level of purchases of books and other publications by students.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have been asked to reply.

I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Nottinghamshire (School Milk)

Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many school-age children in Nottinghamshire receive free or subsidised milk in (a) county council maintained and (b) private schools.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

Claims received to date from the Nottinghamshire county council for the 1983-84 school year have been for the following amounts:

(a) maintained schools	410,208
(b) non-maintained schools	9,328

Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much European Economic Community subsidy is paid to Nottinghamshire county council to provide milk to pupils in (a) county council maintained and (b) private schools.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

I regret that the information requested is not available.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Sugar Products

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the concentration ratio for the top two, three and four firms in the sugar products industry in 1979 and 1983 or the nearest available years.

Mr. Butcher: I am unable to provide the information requested as this would entail disclosure of particulars relating to individual undertakings in the sugar and sugar by-products industry*, which would be in breach of the provisions of the Statistics of Trade Act 1947 under which the source data were collected.

* Group 420, standard industrial classification (revised 1980).

Telegram Service

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what other countries in (a) Europe and (b) the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development operate a telegram service; and which countries in (i) Europe and (ii) the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development do not.

Mr. Butcher: I understand that all other countries in Europe and OECD still operate a telegram service of some sort, although methods for originating and delivering the message may vary.

Software Products (Double Licensing)

Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the effect on the balance of payments of the information technology industry of the proposal to introduce double licensing on software products.

Mr. Butcher: The effect should be negligible since the great majority of exports of software products are to free-world destinations.

Manufactured Goods (Import Substitution)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about the progress of import substitution in the manufactured goods sector of the economy; and if he is aware of any manufactured products imported in 1979 but not then manufactured in the United Kingdom which are now made in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butcher: A satisfactory answer to this question could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Manufacturing Output

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects manufacturing output in both volume and real terms value to exceed the 1979 levels.

Mr. Butcher: Manufacturing output rose 1·5 per cent. in the three months to November 1984 to a level about 3 per cent. higher than a year earlier. On the latest data, output is now 8·5 per cent. above its low point in 1981 Q1 but still 8 per cent. below its level in 1979. The prospects for continuing growth are encouraging. CBI survey results suggest continued growth in manufacturing output and investment. The 1979 level of output will be surpassed in due course. Within manufacturing, output of the electrical engineering and chemical sectors is already well above their respective 1979 levels.

Metrology Report

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he received the recommendations of the Eden committee on metrology; and if he intends to publish the full report when it is available.

Mr. Fletcher: I received a preliminary statement of the Eden committee's main recommendations in December 1984. I expect to receive the full report during the next few weeks and will then decide upon publication arrangements.

Coal and Fuel Oil (Trading Deficit)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table comparing the increase in the trading deficit in (a) coal other than anthracite and (b) fuel oil in the first 11 months of 1984 compared with the same period in 1983, together with his estimate of the effect of this on the exchange rate and on the real cost of imports generally.

Mr. Channon: The trade balances for coal other than anthracite, and fuel oil are in the table. Estimates of the effects of changes in trade balances on exchange rates and imports costs cannot be meaningfully estimated.

EC (Trading Deficit)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the United Kingdom deficit with the EEC in 1984 in (a) trade in manufactures less precious stones and (b) total imports less crude oil and precious stones.

Mr. Channon: In 1984, the deficit on trade in manufactures less precious stones was £7·8 billion on the balance of payments basis. For total trade less crude oil and precious stones the deficit is estimated to have been £10·3 billion on the same basis.

Materials Advisory Group (Report)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his proposals following the receipt of the report of the materials advisory group.

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. Friend announced on 1 August 1984 that he had received the final report of the group and was considering its recommendations. I am grateful to the chairman, Mr. John Collyear, and members of the group for their efforts. The report rightly emphasises the crucial importance of new materials and processes, and their significance for technical change and competitive advantage in new and improved products. Work in these fields will be to the benefit of industry. It is therefore for industry to decide which areas should be developed and to provide finance for this purpose. I have reservations about the need for public finance and for a separate assisted scheme as such. Whilst there is a need for collaboration between researchers, developers, designers and users of this technology, there could well be more effective arrangements, closer to industry, than those proposed.

I am therefore publishing today the Collyear report; copies are being placed in the Library. At the same time I am inviting industrialists and others to let me have early comment on the opportunities identified in the report and how the most effective co-ordination and collaboration can be arranged. Comments will be taken into account in the review of the Department's support for industrial research and development which I announced on 12 November 1984.

Weights and Measures

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each of the past four years the following: hourly charges for the examination of weighing machines and measuring equipment submitted for pattern approval, the percentage by which these fees have increased in each of these years and the proportion by which these increases have varied from the change in the cost of living for each year, respectively.

Mr. Fletcher: The information is as follows:

Date	Hourly charge	Increase on earlier rate	Increase on a year earlier in RPI
	£ per hour	Per cent.	Per cent.
1 January 1981	*	—	13·3
1 January 1982	22	—	12·0
1 January 1983	30·25	37·5	4·9
1 January 1984	32	5·8	5·1

* No hourly charge. The fees charged were fixed and listed in a schedule.

Grants and Aid

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list all forms of grant or other aid available through his Department for areas that qualify for assisted or intermediate status;

(2) if he will list all forms of grant or other aid available through his Department for areas that do not qualify for assisted or intermediate status.

Mr. Trippier: Information on the assistance available from the Department of Trade and Industry to companies in the assisted areas and elsewhere in the United Kingdom is given in the booklets "Does your Project Qualify?" and "How to Make Your Business Grow". Copies of these are available in the Library.

Farm Produce (Exports)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce Export Credits Guarantee Department cover for the export of farm produce.

Mr. Channon: The Export Credits Guarantee Department already makes its facilities available to cover the export of farm produce, subject to its normal criteria.

Cleveland

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much in gross terms has been paid to companies in Cleveland under Government regional grant aid policies in each of the past five years.

Mr. Trippier: The information available in respect of regional grant aid paid to companies in Cleveland county in each of the past five years is given in the following table.

	1979-80*	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85†

Notes:
(a) Amounts over £25,000 paid to all applicants in respect of qualifying premises in Cleveland. Grant payments of £25,000 or less cannot be attributed to any unit smaller than a planning region.
(b) All amounts paid for projects located in Cleveland.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimated provision was made for regional grant aid to Cleveland when compiling the Department's annual budget for each of the past five years.

Mr. Trippier: Estimates of the annual spend on regional development grant aid are not made in respect of individual planning regions or counties in England.

British National Space Centre

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the functions of the British national space centre; who will head it and from where it will be staffed; what its budget is and from where this will be provided; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The Government intend to establish a British national space centre in order to improve the development of space technology in the United Kingdom, and to strengthen the co-ordination of space policy. Detailed arrangements are being worked out and will be announced in due course. But it is likely that the technology centre will be located at RAE, Farnborough, where there is already a successful joint technology programme funded by the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence.

European Space Agency (Meeting)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what resolutions were adopted following the European Space Agency ministerial meeting in Rome on 30-31 January regarding a long-term European space plan and proposals for European participation in the National Aeronautics and Space Administration space station project; and if he will make a statement regarding specific United Kingdom involvement in these developments.

Mr. Pattie: I represented the United Kingdom at a meeting of the Council of the European Space Agency on 30 and 31 January in Rome, the first such Council at Ministerial level since 1977. I am arranging for copies of the Council's resolution and final declaration which were published at the end of the meeting to be placed in the Library of the House.

The resolution approves a long-term European space plan covering the agency's activities for the next 10 years. These will include new developments in the field of man-in-space and in-orbit infrastructure — the Columbus space station programme; development of a new heavy-lift capability launcher Ariane-5; an expansion of the scientific programme by 5 per cent. a year for the next 5 years; and continuing developments in the satellite technology for communications and remote sensing.

The Council welcomed and accepted President Reagan's invitation to participate in the space station and the Columbus programme will be Europe's proposed contribution. For the United Kingdom, I warmly endorsed the proposals overall. I was able to secure agreement from other member states that Britain's industrial participation in the Columbus programme should include the lead in studies on free-flying, astronaut-tended platforms and, on this basis, indicated that we shall contribute 15 per cent. to the £50 million two-year feasibility phase of this programme. With a view to possible later adoption by ESA, the United Kingdom was also invited to keep its ESA partners informed of its further studies on a next-generation technology proposal for a horizontal take-off and landing space vehicle..

Small Master Antenna Television

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make a statement on the future of small master antenna television.

Mr. Butcher: We hope to come to a decision before the next round of cable franchises is initiated by the Cable Authority at the end of February.

Gartcosh Steel Plant

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on future investment plans for the Gartcosh steel plant.

Mr. Butcher: Any proposals for investment at Gartcosh are primarily a matter for BSC.

COCOM

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, before making the export control order giving effect to the recent COCOM agreement he will first publish for consultation a draft of the proposed order.

Mr. Channon: No, but in view of the considerable interest about the details of the proposed new Export of Goods (Control) Order, I intend to allow a period of at least three weeks between publication of the order and its entry into force.

Electrical Equipment (Standards)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any proposals for the accreditation of organisations concerned with standards for electrical equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 1 February 1985, c. 352]: The White Paper "Standards Quality & International Competitiveness" (Cmnd. 8621) identified the considerable industrial and trade benefits to be had from the voluntary accreditation of certification bodies. Accordingly in May 1984 the Government signed a memorandum of understanding with the British Standards Institution under which the National Accreditation Council for Certification Bodies has been established. The council will assess applicant certification bodies against published criteria, which are now being developed, and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will then decide whether to grant accreditation. Accreditation, which will be available to any qualifying body, including those concerned with electrical equipment, is expected to commence in summer this year.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mortgage Interest (Relief)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of taxpayers in each income group receiving relief on mortgage interest and the average relief per mortgagor, together with the assumed rate of interest for the financial year 1984-85.

Mr. Moore: The latest estimates are given in the following table. The figures are derived from a projection from the 1982-83 survey of personal income (the latest available), on the basis of interest rates prevailing during 1984-85. It has been assumed that the rates of interest, currently set by mortgagees will remain in force until the end of the fiscal year. The table does not include the relief given to former option mortgagors who are now included in the arrangements for giving mortgage interest relief at source. I regret that it is not possible to provide reliable estimates for this group in detail.

Taxpayers receiving mortgage interest relief and average relief by range of total income 1984-85

Range of total income (lower limit) £	Numbers receiving mortgage interest relief '000	Average relief per mortgagor £

15,000	950	570
20,000	530	820
30,000	190	1,290

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost of relief on mortgage interest for each of the years from 1975-76 to 1983-84 and the estimated cost for 1984-85.

Mr. Moore: I regret the delay in obtaining the latest estimates, which are as follows. Figures for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are provisional.

Mortgage interest tax relief

	Total cost £ million
1975-76	895
1976-77	1,090
1977-78	1,040
1978-79	1,110
1979-80	1,450
1980-81	1,960
1981-82	2,050
1982-83	2,150
1983-84*	2,750
1984-85*	3,500

* Including the cost of relief in respect of mortgages previously under the option mortgage scheme.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will be replying to the four questions about mortgage interest relief tabled by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury for answer on 11 January.

Mr. John Moore: I regret the delay in providing replies to these questions. All four are being answered today.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer

(1) what would be the increased tax revenue if relief on mortgage interest payments were allowed only at the standard rate of tax;

(2) what would be the increased tax revenue if relief on mortgage interest payments was allowable only at each of the following rates of taxation (a) 25 per cent., (b) 20 per cent. and (c) 15 per cent.;

(3) how many persons currently receive mortgage tax relief at above the standard rate of tax; and what is the annual cost to the Exchequer of this relief;

(4) how many persons currently paying tax only at standard rate would pay tax at a higher rate if mortgage tax relief were removed from higher rates of tax; and what would be the additional income to the Exchequer.

Mr. Moore: I regret the delay in providing this information. Estimates of the direct revenue yields in a full year from restricting mortgage interest relief at 1984-85 levels of mortgage lending are shown as follows. The figures do not take account of possible changes in taxpayers' behaviour.

Rate of mortgage interest relief per cent.	Direct revenue yield £ million
15	1,840
20	1,290
25	730
30	180

About 700,000 mortgagors receive relief at rates in excess of the basic rate of income tax. Of these, about 190,000 who are currently liable only at the basic rate are kept out of higher rates by virtue of relief on their mortgage interest.

European Council

Mr. Normanton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the estimated total cost attributable to public funds for each of the meetings of the European Council during the last five years; and what proportion and actual cost was borne by the British taxpayer.

Mr. Ian Stewart: When the European Council meets in Brussels the costs borne from United Kingdom public funds are chiefly the subsistence costs of those attending from the United Kingdom. The remaining costs are included in the overall budget of the Council to which the United Kingdom contributes from its gross payments to the Community Budget. However, when the European Council meets outside Brussels the major costs are borne by the Presidency. The estimates and figures requested could not therefore be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Bank of England

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list his ministerial responsibilities regarding the policy of the banking department of the Bank of England.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no direct responsibility for the policies of the banking department of the Bank of England. Responsibility for the banking department rests with the Governor and the Court of the Bank under the Bank of England Acts and the bank's charters.

Privatisation

Mr. Merchant asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what have been the proceeds from privatising public sector assets in each fiscal year since 1979-80, divided into the following categories: (a) sale of public sector enterprises, (b) sale of public sector assets (land and so on) and (c) sale of council housing.

Mr. Moore: Net receipts to the Exchequer from disposals regarded as falling within the Government's privatisation programme are classified as special sales of assets. Proceeds from special sales of assets in each year since 1979-80 are shown in table 1, divided between receipts from sales of Government shareholdings in companies, and receipts from other disposals, mostly of land and buildings. Full details were given in the "Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88", Cmnd. 9428 vol. II, table 2.14.

Figures for central Government and local authority sales other than special sales of assets, consisting of routine disposals of land, buildings, vehicles, plant and machinery, are given in table 2. Of these, sales of council housing are by far the largest component. Estimated receipts from council house sales are given in table 3.

Pension Funds

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received from (a) hon. Members, (b) organisations and (c) individuals on the need to change the present taxation regime affecting employee and employer contributions to pension funds and lump sums given under pension arrangements.

Mr. Moore: The recent speculation about possible changes in the present tax regime has provoked a considerable number of letters from hon. Members and members of the public, in addition to many representations from various trade associations and representative bodies. Almost all have expressed opposition to any such change.

Income Tax Thresholds

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the income tax threshold for a two-child family as a percentage of average earnings for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Moore: The table shows the tax threshold and the break-even point—defined as the level of income at which receipt of child benefit equals liability to income tax—for a married man with two children and no tax allowances or reliefs other than the married man's allowance.

	Income tax threshold		Break-even point
	£	as percentage of average earnings	£	as percentage of average earnings
1982-83	2,445	29·9	4,341	53·0
1983-84	2,795	31·4	4,905	55·2
1984-85	3,155	33·0	5,453	57·1

Average earnings are for full-time men, paid at adult rates, in all occupations and assume an increase of 7½ per cent. between 1983-84 and 1984-85, in line with the underlying rate of increase assumed by the Government Actuary.

Value Added Tax (Free Newspapers)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact on the employment and viability of the free newspaper industry of imposing a notional price on such publications for the purposes of a value added tax levy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Treasury Ministers have considered carefully the representations that have been made on behalf of the free newspaper industry, including those on this point. I expect to meet the Association of Free Newspapers shortly.

It would be inappropriate at this stage before my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget statement to comment further.

Value Added Tax (Food)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the additional full year revenue if all food at present zero rated were rated at 5 per cent. for value added tax purposes.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is estimated that the net additional revenue in a full year at 1984-85 prices would be £1,100 million.

Unemployed Persons (Revenue Loss)

Mr. Ashley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will set out in tabular form his estimate of the monthly loss of revenue to the Exchequer when an adult worker becomes unemployed, assuming that he or she was previously on full-time average weekly male or female earnings for (a) a single man, (b) a single woman and (c) a married man with a dependent wife and two children, giving in each case the loss of revenue from (i) income tax, (ii) indirect taxes, (iii) employers' national insurance contributions and (iv) employees' national insurance contributions;

(2) what is his estimate of the loss of revenue arising from an increase of 100,000 in the numbers unemployed from (a) income tax, (b) indirect taxes, (c) employers' national insurance contributions and (d) employees' national insurance contributions.

Mr. Lawson: Any such estimates would depend on a large number of arbitrary assumptions.

Taxation Categories

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many taxpayers fall into each of the following categories (a) single, (b) married couple, husband only working, (c) married couple, wife only working, (d) married couple, both earning, (e) single pensioners and (f) married couple pensioners.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 320]: The latest estimates in respect of 1984-85 are as follows:

Taxpayers under 65	Taxpayers (thousands)
Single	7,800
Married couple, husband only working	4,400
Married couple, wife only working	300
Married couple, husband and wife both working	5,150
Total taxpayers under 65	17,650
Taxpayers over 65
Single	1,250
Married couples	1,300
Total taxpayers over 65	2,550
Total taxpayers	20,200

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the cost of the dependent relative relief;

(2) what would be the cost of the dependent relative relief if its value were raised to that of the additional personal allowance, assuming the existing conditions for reduction.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 320]: The dependent relative allowance costs about £15 million in 1984-85. If the level of the allowance was increased to £1,150 there would be an additional cost of about £140 million at 1984-85 levels of income in respect of the 500,000 current claimants. I regret that it is not possible to provide a reliable estimate of the cost of additional claims for relief.

EC (Agriculture Expenditure)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of European Community expenditure was taken up by agriculture in each of the last three years.

Mr. Jopling: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 14 December 1984 to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) at column 607.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Republic of Ireland

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Billericay on 21 January, Official Report, column 315, how many separate representations were made, and in what form they were made, by the Irish Foreign Minister to Her Majesty's ambassador to Dublin on 15 January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's ambassador received such representations orally and on one occasion.

Belize

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to seek to retain their military presence in Belize while external threats to Belize continue.

Mr. Renton: British troops will remain for an appropriate period to assist Belize with external defence and in the training of the Belize defence force. We wish to see as soon as possible conditions prevail in which the garrison can be safely withdrawn.

EMPLOYMENT

Young People

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, in evaluating the relationship between the earnings of young people relative to adults and their employment prospects, account is taken of the structure of employment demand and available labour supply.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The conclusion that the employment prospects of young people are adversely affected by the high cost of the labour relative to adults was reached after evaluating the results of a number of studies including work on the structure of employment demand and available labour supply. Some studies do suggest that employment structure and labour supply affect demand for young workers. Such results are not, however, inconsistent with the findings on youth's labour costs.

Grants and Aid

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will list all forms of grant or other aid available through his Department for areas that do not qualify for assisted or intermediate status;

(2) if he will list all forms of grant or other aid available through his Department for areas which qualify for assisted or intermediate status.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: All employment measures administered by this Department are available throughout the country.

In addition the Department is responsible for submitting applications to the European social fund in respect of training and employment schemes in the United Kingdom.

Social fund support is available for a wide range of schemes in its priority regions, and for a narrower range in other areas. The European Commission which administers the Fund, is currently considering which regions should have priority for support in 1986.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied with the cost-effectiveness and workings of industrial tribunals.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am satisfied that the industrial tribunals are providing a service that is generally cost-effective and working well. We will continue to look for further improvements without impairing judicial standards or independence and taking proper account of the interests of the parties involved in the system.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many industrial tribunals there are in the United Kingdom; and where they are situated.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Industrial tribunals sit at the times and places determined by the presidents of the industrial tribunals and their regional chairmen. Permanent accommodation for hearing industrial tribunal cases is provided at 25 locations in England and Wales and at 5 locations in Scotland. These are situated as follows:

Birmingham*
Shrewsbury
Bristol*
Exeter
Bury St. Edmunds*
Bedford
Cambridge
Norwich
Cardiff*
Leeds*
Hull
Liverpool*
London Central*
Ashford
London North*
London South*

* Regional offices of the industrial tribunals.

Tribunals are held at centres in other locations as and when requested. Questions relating to the industrial tribunals in Nothern Ireland are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment how much has been paid, in each of the past five years, to industrial tribunal chairmen and panellists by way of allowances and expenses.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is as follows:

	1979-80 £000's	1980-81 £000's	1981-82 £000's	1982-83 £000's	1983-84 £000's
Salaries of presidents and full-time chairmen	*	*	1,683	1,962	2,038
Fees of part-time chairmen and members	1,490	2,244	2,625	3,028	3,302
Travel and subsistence expenses of presidents and full-time chairmen	*	*	43	48	53
Travel and subsistence expenses of part-time chairmen and members	460	452	580	674	762

* The information is not available in the form requested for 1979-80 and 1980-81.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many respondents have obtained costs from industrial tribunals, since powers to award costs were made available for frivolous and vexatious cases; and what was the largest sum awarded.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is readily available only in respect of cases which have been the subject of a pre-hearing assessment. In the four years since the pre-hearing assessment procedure was introduced in October 1980, costs were awarded to 271 respondents at full hearings following such assessment. The largest sum awarded was £1,092.50p.

Industrial Relations

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the objectives of the Government's industrial relations policy; and if he is satisfied with the progress being made.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Our objectives are to redress the imbalance of bargaining power created by the legislation of 1974 and 1976 and to promote a more democratic and responsible trade union movement. Some 40 employers have already sought the protection of the legal remedies provided by our legislation against indiscriminate or undemocratic industrial action. The monopolistic hold of the closed shop has been broken. The second largest trade union in the country and a number of other unions affiliated to the TUC have now decided to apply for public funding for postal ballots.

The provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984 for elections by secret ballot and regular ballots on trade unions' political funds have yet to come into force. The full benefits of our step-by-step legislative programme have therefore yet to be seen but that programme has already proved to be a vital agent of change.

Free Newspapers and Magazines

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate he has made of the numbers of persons employed in the manufacture, distribution and sale of free newspapers and magazines in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department's employment statistics are analysed according to the 1980 standard industrial classification, which does not separately distinguish activities associated with the manufacture, distribution and sale of free newspapers and magazines.

Inner Urban Areas (Unemployment)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the average level of unemployment for male and female adults, and young people, respectively, and in total for the 56 districts which presently enjoy designated area status under the Inner Urban Areas Act.

Mr. Alan Clark: Male, female and total unemployment levels for local authority districts are available in the House of Commons Library; but separate information for adults and young people will not be available until later this year.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the known unemployed are (a) single men, (b) single women and (c) married men with dependent wives and children.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest information comes from provisional results of the 1983 labour force survey, which shows that in the second quarter of 1983 there were 2,939 thousand persons without a job and looking for work, of whom 31 per cent. were single men, 20 per cent. single women and 19 per cent. married men with dependent children under 16. Separate information on those men with both dependent children and dependent wives is not available.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment, of those who became unemployed during December 1983, what proportion obtained a job during 1984; on average, how many months elapsed before they did so; if the figures are now publicly available; and if he will give the figures for the last period for which there are figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: Precise figures are not available in the form requested. However, broad estimates indicate that roughly half of people becoming unemployed leave the claimant register within three months while the order of four in five leave the register within a year. Information is not available on the proportion finding jobs.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of those in work for each year since 1970.

Mr. Alan Clark: Quarterly estimates of the employed labour force are published regularly in table 1.1 of the labour market data section of Employment Gazette, copies of which are in the Library. Estimates for September 1981 to September 1984, the latest available, were published in the January issue of Employment Gazette. Estimates for March 1970 to June 1981 were contained in table 1.1 of Historical Supplement No. 1 to the August 1984 issue of Employment Gazette.

WALES

Bypasses (Anglesey)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to receive the consultants' report on the bypasses for the five villages on the A5 on Anglesey; in what order he expects the studies to be completed; and when he expects to receive the report on the first one.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: The consultants expect to submit one formal report covering all five bypass proposals by the end of the year.

Expenditure

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will break down the figures in table 3.16 of the Government's expenditure plans for 1985-86 to 1987-88, Cmnd. 9428-II on the same basis as tables 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11 and 3.13 of the same publication.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There are no Welsh equivalents to tables 3.9 and 3.13. Otherwise the information is as follows:

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give a breakdown of the capital expenditure under the heading "Other (Non-Home Office) Services", as shown in his answer of 17 January, Official Report, column 214, by each of the Welsh county councils for the years 1981-82 and 1982-83.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is as follows:

Home Office Services

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of capital expenditure on Home Office services by each of the Welsh county councils for each of the last five years since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The table gives details of capital expenditure on Home Office services by Welsh county councils and joint police authorities.

Capital expenditure on Home Office services in Wales
1979-1980 to 1983-1984

Notes:

1. Home Office services includes the fire service given separately in the written answer on 17 January at Column 214. The other services included are police, magistrate and other courts, probation and civil defence.
2. Dyfed/Powys joint police authority covers Dyfed and Powys; North Wales joint police authority covers Clwyd and Gwynedd; and South Wales joint police authority covers Mid Glamorgan, South Glamorgan and West Glamorgan.

Inner Urban Areas Act

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to extend designated area status to other districts in Wales under the Inner Urban Areas Act.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: None at present, but the matter is kept under regular review.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the total financial benefits which have accrued to districts in Wales which presently enjoy designated area status under the Inner Urban Areas Act since obtaining that status.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Under the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978, designated districts have additional powers to assist in the economic regeneration of their areas through the provision of grants and loans, particularly in declared Improvement Areas. These grants and loans are eligible for urban programme support and since 1979-80 some £2·7 million out of a total Urban Programme allocation of £23 million to these districts has been approved as a contribution towards these activities.

Mid-Glamorgan

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to visit Mid-Glamorgan in the near future or meet representatives of Mid-Glamorgan county council.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have made frequent official, political and personal visits to Mid-Glamorgan and will continue to make such visits. I presently have no plans to meet representatives of Mid-Glamorgan county council.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the report, "Deprivation in Mid-Glamorgan", from Mid-Glamorgan county council, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The report, received on 25 January, makes recommendations about designated area status in Mid-Glamorgan. The details on which the recommendations are based will need further discussion. I am arranging for that.

Council Houses

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications have been made to his Department for the remunicipalisation of former council houses; how many such applications have been successful; how many have been refused; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Since we introduced the right-to-buy scheme on 3 October 1980, 10 applications to re-acquire former council houses have been submitted to the Department. Of these four received consent; four were refused consent and two were subsequently withdrawn by the local authority concerned.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of Wales' contribution to the estimated £100 million savings resulting from Her Majesty's Government's proposed limited list of prescribable drugs.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No firm estimate is possible until our deliberations on the results of the consultation exercise are concluded. On the basis of the provisional list issued for consultation the saving in Wales is estimated to be about £5 million per annum.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has engaged in with general practitioners in Wales concerning Her Majesty's Government's plans for a limited list of prescribable drugs.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Our chief medical officer issued a consultation letter to all general medical practitioners in Wales in December 1984 requesting comments on the Government's proposals by 31 January 1985. Senior Welsh Office officials subsequently met representatives of the Welsh Council of the Royal College of General Practitioners to receive representations.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from consultants in Wales concerning Her Majesty's Government's proposed limited list of prescribable drugs.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Four hospital consultants have written offering constructive suggestions regarding the content of the proposed limited list.

Empty Dwellings

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage of empty dwellings in the private, public and other Government-owned housing sectors.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows in respect of housing association, private and local authority dwellings, equivalent data for other Government-owned dwellings as at 1 April 1984; is not available.

	Per cent.
Housing Association	6
Private	6
Local Authority	1

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was (a) the total and the percentage of (i) men and (ii) women unemployed in Wales, unadjusted, including school leavers and (b) how many long-term unemployed men in Wales there are and what percentage this is of the total in Wales, unadjusted.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is available in the House of Commons Library.

ENVIRONMENT

North West Water Supplies (Pollution)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the representations he has received concerning the recent pollution of north-west water supplies.

Mr. Macfarlane: I told the hon. Member on 14 January 1985 at columns 4-5 that no pollutants had entered the North-West water authority's water supplies recently as a result of pollution in the River Dee catchment. That remains the case. I have received representations on the river pollution incidents from one local authority and one private individual.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to introduce legislation to prevent expenditure by local authorities for propaganda purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Local Government has already explained in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on 9 January at columns 763-4, we do not preclude legislation. There are, however, questions of interpretation of the present law still to be resolved by the courts.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will shortly be advising the House of details of the intended impartial inquiry into a number of aspects of local government including discretionary spending on publicity.

Rent Officer Notes

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list in the Official Report the titles of all rent officer notes sent by his Department to rent officers; and if he will place copies of such documents in the Library.

Mr. Gow: Statistical notes issued biannually to rent officers by my Department are available and copies are placed in the Library.

Rent Officers (Documents)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what circulars, advice, guidance, or other documents have been distributed by his Department to rent officers within the last five years.

Mr. Gow: It has always been the Department's practice to issue guidance in various forms to rent officers relating to the rent registration system and to the operation and management of the rent officer service. This has continued under the present Government.

Rent Assessment Panels

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the way in which lay members of rent assessment panels are appointed; if he will list those bodies which are asked to nominate lay members of panels; and if he will publish the criteria by which lay members are appointed.

Mr. Gow: Members of rent assessment panels in England are appointed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Members who are authorised to sit as committee chairmen are appointed by my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor.

Most candidates are proposed by panel presidents, vice-presidents or serving panel members on the basis of local knowledge. Other nominations come from a variety of sources. My right hon. Friend does not invite outside organisations to suggest potential lay members, but it is open to such organisations to do so if they wish. All candidates are interviewed initially by panel presidents who submit recommendations to the Secretary of State.

Lay members are taken from all walks of life, so that panels should reflect the communities which they serve. Members are selected for their qualities of judgment, common sense and ability to take an unbiased view.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will estimate the additional costs to charitable institutions, such as children's homes, youth clubs and tenants' organisations if, as a result of the proposed abolition of the Greater London council, they lose the discount prices for clothing, furniture, and so on, which they currently enjoy through the Greater London council supplies department;

(2) if he will estimate the change in the cost of exercise books purchased by the Greater London council supplies department on behalf of the Inner London education authority and the London boroughs that will be incurred in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council;

(3) if he will estimate the effect of the proposed abolition of the Greater London council on the costs of goods and services currently purchased by London boroughs from the Greater London council supplies department.

Sir George Young: I do not believe that meaningful estimates of this kind could be made; nor do I accept that there need be additional costs. As my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government made clear in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) at columns 378-9, the GLC's central purchasing arrangements can be maintained if the successor bodies so wish it. In any case other local authority purchasing consortia offering comparable services already exist; and the services of the Crown Suppliers are also available.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, in respect of the years 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, how many appeals there have been against local authority decisions in England and Wales to refuse planning permission for the change in use of premises to amusement arcades or centres; and how many appeals have been allowed in each year.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information requested is not available. If my hon. Friend has a particular case in mind, I shall look into it.

Homes Insulation Grant Scheme

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his forecasts of the likely outturn of expenditure on the homes insulation grant scheme for 1984-85.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter on 21 January 1985 at column 266.

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether homes owned by county or metropolitan councils and occupied by officers of an authority engaged in fire protection, policing or school caretaking work, can qualify for assistance under the homes insulation programme.

Sir George Young: The occupiers of homes described by my hon. Friend are eligible to apply for grant under the Homes Insulation Act 1978.

Office Building (Cleveland)

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many projects involving the building of new office blocks are currently in progress in Cleveland.

Sir George Young: I am advised that there are two projects currently in progress involving office development.

Nottinghamshire (Grants)

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the special grants to the city of Nottingham over the past two years;

(2) if he will list the special grants to the Nottinghamshire county council over the past two years.

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Palace of Westminster (Pesticides)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what monitoring of air for pesticide level is or has been carried out within the Palace of Westminster;

(2) which pesticides are used and have been used in treating wood, timbers or fabrics within the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

Mr. Macfarlane: The following pesticides are known to be used in the Palace of Westminster:

Kitchens
- Phenitrothion
- Brodifacoum
- Deltamethrin

Westminster hall
- Cooper WDP

Furniture
- Cuprinol

Some building materials, such as timber and plywood, are likely to have been treated with pesticide during manufacture but the chemicals used are not normally made known. It is, however, known that the plywood backing of the painted panels in the restored ceiling of the Chamber of the House of Lords was treated with Basileum SPI. Large items of furniture which have been attacked by pests are treated off-site, by commercial contractors. My Department does not keep records of the materials used.

The level of pesticide in the air is monitored only in Westminster hall for a period immediately after the timbers have been sprayed.

Caravan Sites Act 1968

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authority districts in England now designed under the terms of the Caravan Sites Act 1968.

Mr. Macfarlane: The following authorities are so designated:

London boroughs
- Barking
- Bexley
- Camden
- Croydon
- Enfield
- Greenwich
- Hammersmith and Fulham
- Havering
- Hillingdon
- Islington
- Kensington and Chelsea
- Kingston upon Thames

- Nuneaton and Bedworth
- Oldham
- Oswestry
- Rochdale
- Rother
- Selby
- South Bedfordshire
- South Bucks
- South Derbyshire
- Trafford
- Wealden
- West Lindsey

Gipsies

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider requiring local authorities to provide a greater number of sites for gipsies in winter.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have no plans to require local authorities to make varying levels of site provision to meet seasonal fluctuations of gipsy movements, but authorities should have regard to such fluctuations when planning the kinds of sites needed.

Mr. John Fraser asked Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the number of places provided by each London borough for gypsies.

Mr. Macfarlane: Following is the information for numbers of pitches provided:

	Numbers
Barking	16
Barnet	nil
Bexley	16
Brent	nil
Bromley	20
Camden	nil
Croydon	15
Ealing	nil

Association of Metropolitan Authorities

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next intends meeting representatives of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have at present no firm plans for such a meeting.

Housing (Inquiry Report)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his response to the recent report of the inquiry into British housing by the National Federation of Housing Associations.

Mr. Gow: The recently published document is a summary of the evidence which I am studying. The inquiry's conclusions and final report are expected to be published in the summer.

London Docklands Development Corporation (Compulsory Purchase)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what compulsory purchase orders have been submitted to him for confirmation by the London Docklands Development Corporation; and what is the number of owners, leaseholders or occupiers, served with statutory notice.

Sir George Young: As I told the hon. Member on 25 January at column 555-6 only the London Docklands Development Corporation (Johnsons draw dock, Ferry street E14) CPO 1984 has been submitted. The corporation has certified that all owners, leaseholders or occupiers have been served with statutory notices. The order shows two such persons.

Mr. Edward Berman

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment for what purpose he obtained the services of Mr. Edward Berman; and what was the period of any contract or arrangement made, together with the terms of service and remuneration paid to him or Inter-Action or any other organisation.

Sir George Young: Mr. Edward Berman was appointed as a special adviser to the then Secretary of State for the Environment on inner city matters, with particular reference to the role of voluntary organisations. His appointment was for nine months from 4 October 1982 to 4 July 1983, on the basis of two-thirds time, to be averaged over the period of the appointment. This was later revised and for the period 1 April to 4 July the appointment was on a full time basis. His salary was based on the mid-point of the assistant secretary scale. The terms of Mr. Berman's appointment provided that, while he was required to withdraw from the paid employment of the Inter-Action Trust, he was permitted to work for it on a voluntary basis, and to undertake consultancy work in time not spent working for the Secretary of State.

Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what meetings have taken place between civil servants in his Department and officers of London boroughs to co-ordinate requests under section 5(2) of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984; what boroughs were involved; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his answer, 31 January 1985, c. 281]: This subject has arisen on numerous occasions in the course of discussions about abolition-related matters. My Department is always ready to discuss the use of section 5, with any borough (or district) that wishes to do so.

Owner-Occupiers

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of owner-occupiers in every fifth year from 1955 to the present, expressed as a gross figure and as a percentage of the population this represents; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Estimates of the owner-occupied housing stock are based on data from the censuses of population and housing in 1961, 1966, 1971 and 1981, and from such information as is available on gains and losses between censuses.

The latest estimates available are as follows:

Owner occupied dwellings, England

	Millions	Percentage of all dwellings
December 1950	3·4	29
April 1961	6·1	44
April 1966	7·2	48
April 1971	8·3	52
December 1975	9·4	55
April 1981	10·6	59
December 1984*	11·7	63

*Provisional.

This steady increase reflects the enormous underlying demand for home ownership, even at times when there has been massive public expenditure on council housing. I am confident that the Government's present policies of encouraging home ownership will lead to futher increases in the number of home owners in the future.

Liverpool (Housing)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he made, prior to setting the capital element of Liverpool's housing investment programme allocation, of the legally binding commitments already entered into for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: In determining housing investment programme allocations I take account of forward commitments as reported by the local authority in the HIP submissions and as amended by discussion at HIP meetings. In the case of Liverpool no assessment was possible at the HIP meeting, since the authority broke off the meeting prematurely. I am concerned about estimates of Liverpool's 1985-86 capital commitments as subsequently reported to the council by the city treasurer.

Local Government Bill

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the letter he has received from Conservative leaders of London borough councils supporting the Local Government Bill; and if the letter has been signed by the leader of Waltham Forest council.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have asked the chairman of the London Boroughs Association, who initiated the letter, to send the hon. Member a copy. It was subscribed to by the Conservative leaders of the other councils listed in the answer given in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 29 November last at column 558-9. This included the leader of the Conservative group on the Waltham Forest council.

SCOTLAND

Kidney Patients

Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients on an area basis were on kidney dialysis machines at 31 December last; and what are the arrangements for further machines.

Mr. John MacKay: At 31 December 1983 (the latest date for which information is available) the following number of patients with renal failure were receiving haemodialysis at the five health board units where this is provided:

	Patients
Grampian	25
Greater Glasgow	220
Highland	13
Lothian	99
Tayside	34
Total	391

It is for the five health boards which provide this treatment to decide how many dialysis machines are required for this.

Housing Defects Act 1984

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when a circular on Orlit housing and defective housing will be issued to all housing authorities in Scotland about the Housing Defects Act and the scheme of assistance for owners of prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings; and if he will consider issuing similar guidance in relation to Orlit and defective housing in the public sector.

Mr. Ancram: The circular on the scheme of assistance under the Housing Defects Act 1984 was issued to local authorities on 21 November 1984. A copy is available in the Library of the House.

The Government have no plans to issue specific guidance to local authorities regarding their own stocks of Orlit and other defective houses that come within the scope of the Housing Defects Act. Useful and detailed guidance of specific house types, including Orlits, is already available in the form of reports published by the Building Research Establishment. Authorities themselves are best placed to assess the local situation and needs; it is for them to decide what action, in any, may be necessary and then, if appropriate, to programme realistically phased works according to the resources available.

EC Grants (Edinburgh)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will publish a table giving the European Economic Community grants for the various European Economic Community funds which have been made available in the Edinburgh area.

Mr. Younger: The table shows the monies received for both infrastructure and industrial projects in the Edinburgh area from the European regional development fund and for agricultural projects in the Edinburgh area under the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund (FEOGA) scheme. Scotland as a whole also benefits from grants from the European social fund but it is not possible to provide a breakdown of the figures for individual areas. Edinburgh has not, as yet, benefited from the European Coal and Steel Community grants.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those organisations which the Forestry Commission proposes to invite to its seminar on the "Broadleaves In Britain" consultation paper on 9 May in Edinburgh; and when he will make a policy statement on forestry policy with respect to broadleaved woodlands.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question by the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) on 24 January 1985 which provided details of those organisations invited to the Forestry Commission seminar on 8 May 1985. The following bodies have since been added to the list of invitees:

National Farmers' Union of Scotland
National Trust for Scotland
Scottish Landowners' Federation.

Forestry Ministers hope to be in a position to make a policy statement on broadleaved woodlands before the summer recess.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans the Forestry Commission has to extend consultation over felling licences with the Nature Conservancy Council from sites of special scientific interest to include other broadleaved woodlands.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council are discussing, in the context of the consultative paper on broadleaves in Britain, the drawing up of guidelines for the management of broadleaved woodlands of various categories. The adoption of such guidelines is considered to be preferable to extending consultation to cover broadleaved woodlands outside sites of special scientific interest.

Scottish Hospital Advisory Scheme

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many psychiatric hospitals have been visited since the beginning of 1982 under the Scottish hospital advisory scheme; and in how many cases changes were recommended to ensure that all patients are allowed to wear their own clothing.

Mr. John MacKay: Thirteen psychiatric hospitals have been visited by the Scottish hospital advisory service since 1 January 1982; in nine cases changes were recommended to ensure that all patients were allowed to wear their own clothing.

Psychiatric Hospitals

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) which psychiatric hospitals in Scotland do not have a rehabilitation unit in operation at present.

(2) which psychiatric hospitals in Scotland do not have access to a staffed rehabilitation hostel outside the hospital, but within the hospital catchment area.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not kept centrally.

Homes Insulation Grant Scheme

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he plans any reduction in the amount available in Scotland under the homes insulation scheme for 1985-86.

Mr. Ancram: The total amount available for allocation to local authorities in 1985-86 for grants under the Homes Insulation Scheme is about £0·7 million less than in 1984-85. This is because authorities have consistently underspent in recent years. The amount available for distribution in 1985-86 should certainly be sufficient to meet the anticipated demand for grant, both for first-time insulation and for the topping up of existing insulation.

West of Scotland Science Park

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to the answer of 30 January, Official Report, column 206-7, regarding the development of the west of Scotland science park he will state the basis for the statement that the park has been operating for two years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his reply of 30 January, Official Report, columns 206-7, regarding the action of the Scottish Development Agency property division taking over the west of Scotland science park, Maryhill, if the science park is now to be managed as an industrial estate; and if he has discussed, or will discuss, the arrangements with both Glasgow and Strathclyde universities.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The west of Scotland science park will continue to be developed and managed for occupation solely by companies engaged in high technology research and development. This is reflected in the terms on which the agency leases the site from Glasgow university. Each letting moreover continues to require the concurrence of both Glasgow and Strathclyde universities. The management arrangements are the responsibility of the agency and there is no reason for me to discuss them with the universities.

School Examinations (Disruption)

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements the Scottish examination board proposes to make in the light of the instructions given to Scottish teachers by their unions to disrupt certain procedures associated with examinations for the Scottish Certificate of Education in 1985.

Mr. Younger: I am aware that certain teachers unions are threatening to disrupt administrative and other procedures associated with the 1985 Scottish certificate of education examinations at ordinary and higher grade and the certificate of sixth year studies. I would strongly deplore the taking of such unprecedented action which can only be designed to damage the vital interests of pupils themselves. The teachers should withdraw from all their current action in the light of the way forward I have offered through the Scottish joint negotiating committee (secondary education); and I would urge all teachers in any event to refrain from the extremely serious escalation of their action which would be involved in striking at the examination system.

I nevertheless recognise that pupils and their parents need urgent re-assurance about the prospects for the 1985 SCE examinations in the light of the teachers threats. Following discussions in which my Department has been fully involved, the Scottish Examination Board have today issued a circular to schools and local authorities in Scotland (copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House) giving advice on the conduct of the 1985 examinations. We shall also be placing advertisements in the press from tomorrow. The key elements of the approach being taken by the Scottish Examination Board and the Government are as follows:

> the Government will do everything possible in consultation with the board and with the local authorities to ensure that this year's SCE examinations go ahead as planned; > exceptionally for this year, the Scottish Examination Board will generally be prepared to make awards based on the external written examinations only. Candidates will not be penalised if marks for oral, practical or other internally assessed work are not submitted as a result of action by teachers; but where such marks are available and would improve the overall award they will be used. The Board may however have to make special arrangements in certain subjects, in particular where the practical element accounts for a major proportion of the total mark, and will issue further advice as soon as possible;
> the Board cannot however make allowance in marking for any loss of teaching time before the examination:

examinations reflect actual performance, not potential. To adopt any other course would seriously prejudice the quality and acceptability of the Scottish certificate of education; normal appeal arrangements will apply; and in any event candidates who do not obtain satisfactory marks in any subject this year will be able as usual to resit the examination in 1986. This provision includes inter alia those candidates who are sitting English, mathematics and arithmetic this year; and pupils who are in S4 this year and are sitting the certificate of secondary education examinations run by the English examining boards, in English and mathematics, will also be permitted to sit O grade in these subjects in 1986; schools will be kept informed of any further changes in the arrangements for the 1985 examinations resulting from the teachers' actions.

I believe that the revised arrangements the SEB are adopting will provide equitably for the situation which will arise if teachers do indeed withhold co-operation from the 1985 examinations in the way suggested; and will maintain the standards of the Scottish certificate of education.

TRANSPORT

London Regional Transport

13. Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange joint discussions with the Greater London council, London Regional Transport and his Department in the light of the court judgment of 11 January on the funding of London Regional Transport.

Mr. Ridley: I have offered discussions between my officials and GLC officers in the light of my announcement on 29 January, about my intention to legislate following the High Court judgment.

18. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many meetings he has had with the Greater London Council to discuss London Regional Transport in the last six months.

Mrs. Chalker: I have had three meetings involving the GLC in the last six months, but LRT has not been discussed as the GLC has not had responsibility for LRT in that period.

Channel Link

14. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the latest report regarding the Channel link.

Mr. David Mitchell: We expect to receive the advice of the official Anglo-French working group preparing guidance for potential promoters at the end of the month.

British Rail

16. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of British Rail; and what subjects he discussed.

17. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss the prospects for improved productivity in the railway industry.

Mr. Ridley: I meet the chairman of British Rail regularly to discuss matters of mutual interest, including the scope for improved productivity. I last met the chairman on 21 January and plan to see him again towards the middle of this month.

EC (Civil Aviation)

19. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are his policy aims in relation to civil aviation between European Community member states.

Mr. Michael Spicer: To introduce greater competition into air transport between member states, and to remove present restrictions. This will allow airlines to offer the services and fares which they judge will best meet consumer demand. We can already see the benefits of our more liberal agreements with the Dutch and the Germans.

Buses

21. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the Bill on bus transport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Bill was given a First Reading on 31 January.

33. Mr. Bagier asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many professional organisations of proven expertise in the public transport field have made submissions in favour of the proposals contained in his White Paper "Buses"; and if he will list them in the Official Report.

41. Mr. Cowans asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many professional organisations of proven expertise in the public transport field have made submissions in response to his White Paper "Buses", urging changes in his proposals; and if he will list them in the Official Report.

Mr. Ridley: I have received numerous responses from organisations with expertise in the public transport field for and against various aspects of our proposals.

39. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has had respecting his White Paper "Buses"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I and my colleagues have had a number of meetings with representatives of the bus industry, of local authorities, consumers and other organisations with an interest in our proposals.

44. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library an up-to-date summary of the representations he has received on his "Buses" White Paper.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

45. Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the submissions received by him in response to his "Buses" White Paper were on balance favourable to his proposals; and how many were opposed.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received nearly 8,000 responses both for and against various aspects of our proposals.

46. Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Transport what improvements in safety standards he anticipates from implementation of the "Buses" White Paper.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to my reply earlier today to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden).

Motor Vehicles (Lighting)

22. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce a campaign in the Greater London Council area as to the condition of lighting on motor cars and lorries.

Mrs. Chalker: We are preparing a leaflet for issue nationally which not only advises motorists about the use of lights on vehicles, but also urges them to keep all their lights clean and in good working order. Guidance on this is also given in the Highway Code.

Gatwick Airport (Noise)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the monitoring of aircraft noise at Gatwick airport.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Aircraft taking off from Gatwick are required to meet statutory noise limits, and are monitored to ensure that these limits are observed. Infringements are taken up with the airlines concerned by my Department.

British Rail (Purchases)

24. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Transport what total expenditure Her Majesty's Government have approved for the purchase by British Rail of new and replacement rolling stock since June 1983.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since June 1983, the Government have approved expenditure by British Rail of £216 million on new passenger rolling stock.

Air Traffic (UK-Netherlands)

25. Mrs. Kellett-Bowman asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any estimates of changes in the level of air traffic between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands as a result of the agreement reached between the two Governments in summer 1984.

Mr. Michael Spicer: London-Amsterdam traffic was 16 per cent. higher in the second half of 1984 than in the same period in 1983. This percentage increase is significantly greater than for traffic to Paris or Brussels or to Europe as a whole.

Motorways (Lighting)

26. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport, if, in the light of the recent report on road safety by the Select Committee on Transport, he will now consider providing lights on all new motorways and also give further consideration to lighting the unlit sections of existing motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: The report, which covers many aspects of road safety, is being considered very carefully and our response will of course cover the road lighting items raised by my hon. Friend.

Dartford Tunnel

27. Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government concerning that offer of the Greater London council to purchase the Dartford tunnel from Essex and Kent county councils.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that GLC officials have been asked to investigate the possibility of the council acquiring the tunnel but that no offer to buy has been made.

Transport and Road Research Laboratory

28. Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will visit the Transport and Road Research Laboratory.

Mr. Ridley: I visited the Transport and Road Research Laboratory in March last year. I expect to make further visits from time to time.

Nuclear Electromagnetic Pulse

29. Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has ensured that essential road, rail, sea and air transport required in an emergency will not be affected by nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

38. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave to my hon. Friends the Members for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind), Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) and Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) earlier today.

A19

30. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretay of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the investigations being made into repairs on the A19 road.

Mrs. Chalker: In my reply to the hon. Member on 12 November 1984 I referred to further investigations by my Department on the condition of the stage II carriageway. We have concluded that certain repair work is now required to strengthen the pavement on the southbound carriageway south of the Parkway intersection to Redhill bridge, and a short section of the northbound carriageway adjacent to the intersection. These will receive an overlay in the summer of 1985. Further investigations are now in progress on the section south of the Redhill bridge, to determine the extent of any other repairs that may be necessary and these are expected to be completed in the summer.

Negotiations with the consultants and contractors involved in the original construction are continuing.

Driving Tests, Basildon

31. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people from Basildon took the driving test in each of the last four years.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that this information is not readily available.

Manchester International Airport

32. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, as part of his proposed programme of visits to regional airports, he will pay a visit to Manchester international airport.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I visited Manchester international airport on 14 November 1984 and received a comprehensive briefing from the management and members of the airport authority.

St. Pancras-Sheffield Line

34. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has recently met the chairman of the British Railways Board to discuss investment in the St. Pancras-Sheffield line.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Airports (Snow Clearing)

35. Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what, for the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available, was the total number of hours during which normal operations were suspended at all international airports as a result either of the inability of snow-clearing facilities to clear snow from runways or of the absence of such facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Such figures are not available and could be produced only at disproportionate cost. However, statistics published by the British Airports Authority show that, in the financial year 1983-84, its airports were closed for the following periods for the clearance of snow and ice:

Airport	Period of time
Heathrow	Nil
Gatwick	Nil
Stansted	6 hours and 2 minutes
Glasgow	15 hours and 37 minutes
Edinburgh	1 hour and 30 minutes
Prestwick	Nil
Aberdeen	23 hours and 43 minutes

British Rail Services (London)

36. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next plans to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss the provision of rail services in and around London.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend and I have regular meetings with the chairman at which this is often among the subjects discussed.

Roads (Expenditure)

37. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the size and allocation of capital expenditure on motorways and trunk roads in 1984-85.

Mrs. Chalker: Planned capital expenditure for 1984-85 on motorways and trunk roads in England is £728 million, of which £579 million is allocated to new construction and £149 million to renewals.

Road Safety (Report)

40. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to reply to the Transport Committee's report on road safety; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I welcome the committee's report as a constructive contribution to the debate on how to improve road safety. I am considering its recommendations very carefully and will respond as soon as possible.

Trunk Road Programme

42. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he plans to introduce more precise dates for the start of road construction schemes as part of his review of the trunk road programme.

Mrs. Chalker: The actual start dates for trunk road schemes in England depend on the variable impact of three main interlocking factors—their relative priority within the road programme, the amount of resources available in any one year, and the rate of progress of proposed schemes through the necessary design and statutory public consultation processes. Given the variable effect of these factors it would not make sense to produce more precise forecasts of likely start dates than those currently in use.

M25 (Epping Forest)

43. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Transport what measures have been taken for the reduction of noise from the M25 within the Epping Forest district of Essex since the official opening of that part of the motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: Four further properties in Ivychimneys road have been identified as being eligible for double-glazing; offers for this have accordingly been made to the owners. As my hon. Friend knows, we took considerable measures to reduce noise nuisance prior to the road being opened to traffic.

British Airways

47. Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of selling British Airways.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It is not possible to estimate the cost of the sale at this time. It will depend on a number of variables, including the sale price of the shares, which have yet to be determined.

Local Government Reform

48. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Transport what effect he expects the abolition of the Greater London council to have on London traffic arrangements.

Mrs. Chalker: Beneficial.

Concessionary Pass Schemes

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce legislation removing from local authorities the right to determine the specific type of public transport concessionary pass scheme which they operate within their areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Transport Bill published on 31 January contains no such provision; nor does my right hon. Friend intend to seek one. Local authorities will continue to have discretion to choose the form of concessionary schemes best suited to their area. As the White Paper made clear, the Government's intention is to make only two changes to the current arrangements; to ensure that all operators can participate, and to make payments to operators reflect the cost of the concessions, thus avoiding concealed subsidy to bus services generally.

Highway Corridors (London)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if roads in the areas to be covered by his highway corridor studies are currently the responsibility of either the Greater London council or London boroughs.

Mrs. Chalker: Yes.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what liaison there will be between his consultants and the Greater London council and London boroughs during the course of the highway corridor studies.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department has invited the Greater London council and London boroughs to attend meetings and to contribute information and views on the traffic and environmental problems facing those who live and work in their areas. I hope that the Greater London council and those London boroughs that have so far refused to do so, will reconsider their position.

Road Traffic Act 1974

Mr. Mark Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Transport when it is intended to bring into operation section 7 of the Road Traffic Act 1974.

Mr. Ridley: There are at present no plans to do so.

Channel Crossing

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the studies undertaken by his Department into the possible construction of a Channel road bridge and tunnel have arrived at any conclusions as to the side of the road on which motorists should drive; whether there will be a changeover half way across; and whether any common position on this issue has been arrived at with the French authorities.

Mr. David Mitchell: I will answer this question shortly.

Visibility Monitoring Sensor

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his Department's evaluation of the Marconi MET-1 visibility monitoring sensor; and whether it is being considered for use throughout Britain's motorway network.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) on 28 and 29 January at columns 11 and 83 respectively.

I have nothing further to add.

Tanker Havens

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what public consultation his Department has carried out regarding its plans for tanker havens around the British Isles;

(2) if he will give a date for the publication of a list or map of tanker havens around the coast of Britain;

(3) if he will ensure that no sites of importance for nature conservation, as identified by the Nature Conservancy Council, are considered or used by his Department as tanker havens;

(4) if he will list those areas of coastline identified by his Department for use as tanker havens;

(5) if he will list the criteria used by the marine pollution control unit of his Department in assessing and identifying potential and actual tanker havens;

(6) if he will list those local authorities consulted by his Department regarding the identification and investigation of sites for coastal tanker havens, to be used as shelters for tankers in distress or leaking oil.

Mr. David Mitchell: It has long been established that the most effective way of preventing a continued spillage of oil from a damaged tanker is to remove her cargo by an emergency transfer operation and this can best, and most safely, be done in a sheltered place.

The possibility of drawing up a short list of specific places where such shelter might be provided was considered but has been rejected as being impractical. Instead the Nature Conservancy Council, the local authority associations and the Fisheries Departments have agreed that a broad survey of the whole of the United Kingdom coastline should be undertaken and a data bank established of all the marine, amenity and environmental factors that would need to be considered should a decision have to be taken to move a damage tanker to a sheltered place.

The NCC and MAFF have already been consulted about the environmental aspects involved and local authority views will be sought shortly.

Electrically Assisted Cycles

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the safety of electrically assisted cycles.

Mrs. Chalker: The regulations limit the weight, speed and power of these vehicles so that in general they share the hazards and safety features of ordinary bicycles. For example, being small, quiet and slow moving, they run the risk of not being noticed by other road users. But unlike bicycles they may not be used by children under 14, and particular designs of electric cycle may incorporate features not present on conventional cycles. For example, the Sinclair C5 has different conspicuity characteristics being lower than a cycle, similar in height to an open sports car, but with conspicuous white bodywork and a very good rear lamp. The C5 has a safety advantage over bicyles in that one cannot wobble or fall off it, and the brakes are very effective in both the dry and the wet. The Department does not expect the C5 to have an accident record dissimilar from that which applies to pedal cycles generally.

We are watching developments and the Transport and Road Research Laboratory will be looking at the C5 and any other type of electrically assisted cycle which may be produced on a substantial scale.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Assembly

Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement regarding the progress of the working of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr. Hurd: The Assembly continues diligently to carry out its consultative functions. We now want to see it produce proposals for devolution which would be likely to command widespread acceptance throughout the community.

Compensation Payments

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the sums paid in the latest financial year and the financial year to date in (a) compensation for property damaged and (b) compensation for personal injury suffered by the security forces and the public as a result of the civil unrest in Northern Ireland from 1 January 1968 to the latest available date; and what have been the total amounts claimed for such injuries in each year and (c) compensation payments under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978.

Mr. Scott: Information on criminal injury compensation claims cannot be provided in the form requested as applicants do not claim specific amounts. Personal injuries compensation payments made under the Criminal Injuries to Persons (Compensation) Act (Northern Ireland) 1968 are not recorded separately for civilian and members of the security forces. The available information is as follows:

	1983-84 £	1984-85 to 31 December £
Total compensation payments for property damage	19,472,529	15,535,483
Total compensation payments for personal injuries under the Criminal Injuries to Persons (Compensation) Act (NI) 1963 and the Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (NI) Order 1977	8,377,447	6,610,183

Fair Employment Agency

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of individual discrimination were found by the Fair Employment Agency in 1984; and how many of these were against (a) Roman Catholics and (b) Protestants.

Dr. Boyson: There were 10 findings of individual discrimination, all of which were of discrimination against Roman Catholics.

Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the proportion and number of persons accused of scheduled offences on the basis, either wholly or partially, of accomplice witnesses' testimony who are accorded bail; and what is the equivalent proportion of persons accused of scheduled offences who are not charged on the basis of accomplice testimony who are accorded bail in each year since 1980.

Mr. Scott: Information is not kept in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Homes Insulation Grant Scheme

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Offical Report a table giving, by quarter since their inception, for Northern Ireland (a) the number of dwellings insulated under the local authorities energy conservative programme and a breakdown of the body which completed the work, (b) the cost of the programme and (c) the number of dwellings insulated under the home insulation scheme and a breakdown of tenancies to whom the grants were paid, (d) the amounts of the payments, (e) the number of 90 per cent. grants paid and their costs and (f) the financial allocation for each of the past financial years to each of these schemes and the allocation for the current financial year.

Dr. Boyson: There is no equivalent in Northern Ireland to the local authorities energy conservation programme. Grants towards the cost of home insulation are available under the home insulation grant scheme which is now funded by the Department of Economic Development and administered by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

The table sets out, on a quarterly basis since the inception of the scheme, the number of dwellings insulated under the home insulation scheme (at standard rate of grant 66 per cent. and at special need rate 90 per cent.) in the private and public sectors; and the amounts of payments.

Education and Library Boards

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to him to indicate the total expenditure on books by each of the education and library boards in Northern Ireland for each of the past six years.

Mr. Scott: Figures available include expenditure on practice materials (such as rulers, compasses, clay, wood, chemicals etc), as well as on books at schools and institutions of further education and on books purchased for public libraries. They are as follows:

£000s

Area boards	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Belfast	1,717	1,708	1,857	1,694	1,437	1,512

Kidney Patients

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the current level of dialysis provision in Northern Ireland, the numbers on the waiting list for dialysis provision and what proposals he is making to improve the provision of and access to dialysis for kidney patients in all parts of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The renal unit at the Belfast city hospital can provide dialysis treatment for up to 42 patients and this will shortly be increased by 12 as a result of proposals drawn up by the Eastern health and social services board. This dialysis provision is supported by a relatively high transplant programme which subject to the availability of donor kidneys, can cope with up to 48 transplants per year. At present 30 patients are on the waiting list for dialysis treatment and 40 are waiting for transplants. The Department of Health and Social Services in consultation with the health and social services boards is also considering the further development of services for kidney patients including the feasibility of providing dialysis units outside Belfast.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining how the Department of Health and Social Services in Northern Ireland estimates or assesses the income of small farmers for the purpose of awarding family income supplement; and whether he has any proposals to change this.

Mr. Chris Patten: Claims for family income supplement are determined by independent adjudication officers and in dealing with self employed claimants the net profit derived from the occupation is taken into account. In deciding the net profit of farmers a profit and loss account would first be sought but, if this was not available, the net profit would be estimated using profit margin figures supplied by the Department of Agriculture. There are no proposals to change this system of assessment.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, in the light of the recent exceptionally severe weather in Northern Ireland, he has any plans to give single payments to help supplementary benefit claimants meet any resultant fuel debt.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) on 1 February 1985, at column 349.

Value Added Tax

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether value added tax is paid by his Department on the cost of salting roads and for snow clearance.

Mr. Chris Patten: Value added tax is paid on the costs of materials used and plant purchased or hired for these operations.

New Jobs (Strangford)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the 5,189 new jobs provided in Northern Ireland in the year ended 31 December 1984 were located in the constituency of Strangford.

Dr. Boyson: Of the 5,189 new jobs promoted in Northern Ireland by the Industrial Development Board in the year ended 31 December 1984, 350 were located in the constituency of Strangford.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Research and Development (Expenditure)

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what figures he uses in comparing Government research and development spending on agriculture in the United Kingdom with that in other countries.

Mrs. Fenner: International comparisons of Government expenditure on agricultural research and development are published by the OECD and by Eurostat; but in making these comparisons regard must be had to differences between the sets of national data used.

EC (Import Levies)

Mr. Merchant asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what, expressed in pence per pound, is the import levy into the EEC of the following goods (a) butter, (b) cheese, (c) sugar, (d) wheat and (e) beef.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows. The import levies shown have been adjusted for monetary compensatory amounts set for the United Kingdom. The rates shown are those applicable on 23 January 1985.

United Kingdom levy

	p per lb.
Butter (82 per cent. fat)	*52·5
Cheese (Cheddar)	*48·9
Sugar	†12·6
Common wheat	1·5
Beef	‡64·7

* In practice, special quota arrangements apply to most imports of butter and cheese from third countries, allowing entry at reduced rates of levy. Under these schemes a levy of 19·5p per lb would apply in the case of 80 per cent. fat butter and a levy of 4·2p per lb would apply to Cheddar cheese imported from New Zealand under the quota arrangements.

† In practice, the United Kingdom's imports from third countries are generally covered by the Lomé Convention and enter the Community levy free.

‡ The rates vary according to Tariff Heading and country of origin. The rate for carcase meat (Tariff Heading 02.01A IIa1) from third countries other than Austria, Switzerland or Sweden is quoted. In practice, most beef imports from third countries are subject to special arrangements allowing entry at reduced rates of levy.

EC Expenditure

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the percentage increase in European Economic Community agriculture expenditure in 1983 compared with 1982, and in 1984 compared with 1983; and what change he anticipates in 1985.

Mr. MacGregor: The increase in EC agriculture expenditure over the previous year was 28 per cent. in 1983 and is estimated at 16 per cent. in 1984. The 1985 Community budget has not yet been adopted.

Foodstuffs (Price)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish a table in the Official Report showing what adjustment has had to be made under the common agricultural policy to the price of principal foodstuffs in the United Kingdom in the period since last September as a result of the fall in the pound sterling against the deutschmark.

Mr. MacGregor: As I told the hon. Member on 17 December 1984 in a written reply at column 34, changes in the value of the deutschemark or of sterling have no effect on CAP support prices in the United Kingdom.

Skimmed Milk Powder

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what percentage of adulterated milk powder has been exported over the last five years; and which countries have been the principal recipients;

(2) what are the principal sources of skimmed milk powder currently held in intervention in the United Kingdom;

(3) what is his latest estimate of the total amount of skimmed milk powder held in the United Kingdom under intervention; and what percentage in the current year he expects to be adulterated under European Community Regulation 443/77;

(4) what percentage of the skimmed milk powder held in storage at the Bedwan house industrial estate, near Caerphilly, has ultimately been adulterated under European Economic Community Regulation 443/77 for each year of its operation; and what has been the total yearly cost of that adulteration;

(5) what has been the total amount of skimmed milk powder, for each of the European Economic Community countries and for each of the last five years, denatured under European Economic Community Regulation 443/77; and what percentage of each country's output this constituted;

(6) what percentage of skimmed milk powder held in storage in England, Scotland and Wales, respectively, has been adulterated under European Economic Community Regulation 443/77 for each of the last five years;

(7) what has been the cost to each of the European Economic Community countries for each of the last five years of the administration of European Economic Community Regulation 443/77; and what has been the average unit cost of skimmed milk powder purchased and adulterated powder sold;

(8) what is the average period of time skimmed milk powder is held in storage before being adulterated under European Economic Community Regulation 443/77.

Mr. MacGregor: I will write to the hon. Member.

Central Bristol Channel

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) in which year sampling and sonar surveys have been carried out by his Department in the vicinity of the central Bristol channel sea wastes dump at latitude 51° 24·5'N and longitude 04° 04'W;

(2) for each year since 1974, what was the tonnage of (a) sewage sludge and (b) industrial waste licensed for disposal in the central Bristol channel; and what were the corresponding tonnages actually dumped;

(3) whether he has available to him any reports on the field assessment of effects of dumping wastes in the vicinity of the central Bristol channel at latitude 51° 24·5'N and longitude 04° 04'W that is more recent than Fisheries Research Technical Report No. 59.

Mr. MacGregor: The quantities licensed for disposal and those actually dumped in the central Bristol channel site between 1974 and 1983 (the latest year for which figures are available) were:

'000 tonnes

	Sewage Sludge		Industrial Waste
	Licensed	Dumped	Licensed	Dumped
1974	350	281	5·1	3·0
1975	675	346	14·5	6·0
1976	481	308	7·5	6·7
1977	517	330	10·1	5·3
1978	482	394	8·5	5·0
1979	482	358	7·4	3·8
1980	482	392	5·4	2·8
1981	482	328	5·5	3·3
1982	572	320	5·4	2·8
1983	525	230	4·8	2·0

Fisheries Research Technical Report No. 59 is the latest completed field assessment, but an analysis is in train of a supplementary survey undertaken in 1983. As the report indicates, samples were taken in 1975, 1976 and 1977 and a sonar survey was carried out in 1976. Subsequently, further samples were taken in the 1983 survey.

Suffolk Small Woodlands Project

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Forestry Commission has studied the Suffolk small woodlands project; and what plans it has to establish similar management advice schemes in other counties.

Mrs. Fenner: The Forestry Commission is fully aware of this project. The possibility of setting up schemes of this type in other parts of the country is one of the questions currently being considered in the context of the commission's review of broadleaved woodland policy.

Parliamentary Secretary (Caribbean Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the Parliamentary Secretary's recent visit to the Caribbean; and why it was cut short.

Mrs. Fenner: I visited the Windward Islands at the invitation of their Governments. The purpose of the visit was to see on the ground the action being taken to secure the major improvements which Her Majesty's Government have been seeking in the quality of the fruit shipped to the United Kingdom under long-standing preferential arrangements enjoyed by these countries. These arrangements are recognised in protocol 4 of the 3rd EEC-ACP convention of Lomé.

In discussions with the Prime Ministers of each of the four islands which traditionally supply bananas to the United Kingdom market, I stressed that privileged access to the United Kingdom market implies an obligation to give the British consumer a fair deal on quality. I chaired, jointly with the Minister of Agriculture of St. Lucia, a committee to monitor progress on programmes of improvement agreed in 1983 and to determine further action necessary to ensure attainment of agreed quality targets; and I visited banana-growing regions and studied quality control procedures at every stage from production to shipping to see how measures to improve quality agreed anaupon between the United Kingdom and the Windward Island Governments were being put into effect.

I am convinced that the Governments of the Windward Islands are now fully committed to ensuring that their exports match up to the needs of the British consumer.

I returned to the United Kingdom early in order to be present for the debate in the House on 31 January.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the Parliamentary Secretary, will now resume her engagements with the banana quality monitoring committees in Caribbean countries following her return to the United Kingdom to vote in the House on 31 January; which members of her party returned with her to the United Kingdom; and what additional costs to public funds have been incurred as a result of this change of plans.

Mrs. Fenner: I returned to the United Kingdom on 31 January, together with Mr. Fenner and my private secretary. As I am not in a position to return to the Caribbean at the present time the cost of the visit to public funds will be appreciably lower than previously estimated.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any proposals to ensure price maintenance of branded products exluded from the limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Products which can no longer be prescribed for National Health Service use will be excluded from DHSS price control from 1 April. From that date manufacturers will be free to fix their own prices.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received advocating the inclusion of the laxative known as Duphalac Lactulose on his proposed limited list of drugs for use by paraplegics and other disabled people.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received a number of comments about the laxatives to remain available on National Health Service prescription under our limited list proposals including some which cite the needs of diabled people. We are carefully considering all these views.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the doctors who have written to his Department commenting on the proposal to limit the range of medicines prescribable under the National Health Service have expressed unqualified approval of the proposals; how many approved of the proposals but with reservations; how many expressed opposition to the proposals; and what percentage of doctors registered to practice medicine in the United Kingdom is represented by each of the groups outlined.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received about 3,400 letters from doctors commenting on our proposals to limit the range of drugs available in certain therapeutic categories. Of these, some 1,800 support the proposals or make constructive suggestions on the contents of the list. Many of the remainder, including over 300 copies of a circular letter supplied to doctors by Roche Pharmaceuticals Ltd., show an imperfect understanding of our proposals. The number of doctors who have written represents under 2 per cent. of all doctors registered to practice medicine in the United Kingdom.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from trade unions about the effect of the limited list proposals on employment in pharmaceutical research and production.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received representations from a number of individual trades union members, from some branch organisations and from the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will name the organisations that have written to him making representations about his limited list proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have received representations from a wide range of organisations but a list suitable for publication could not be compiled without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what reply he has sent to the comments and suggestions submitted by the Royal College of General Practitioners regarding the proposed National Health Service limited drugs list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are still considering the comments and suggestions submitted by the Royal College of General Practitioners and will respond to them as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the representatives of the medical profession appointed to advise him on his limited list proposals have been required to sign a declaration under the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. Members of the group will have access to information of considerable financial value to those with an interest in the market for pharmaceutical products. They are people of considerable distinction however and we have complete confidence in their discretion and judgment. They have been encouraged to consult colleagues outside the group about the clinical aspects of the list.

Nevertheless, the legal position is that the members of the Chief Medical Officer's Advisory Group would commit an offence under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 if they made an unauthorised disclosure of information entrusted to them in confidence by Ministers or officials of our Department. Our officials drew their attention to the statutory requirements and they were invited, but not required, to sign an acknowledgement that their attention had been drawn to them and that they understood them.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people living in reception centres have been rehoused by local authorities in the current year; and how this compares with the figures for each year since 1974.

Mr. Whitney: 249 people living in resettlement units (formerly reception centres) were rehoused in local authority rented accommodation in the 12 months up to 20 November 1984. The only other period for which figures are available was April to November 1983 when 192 people were accommodated in this way.

Circular HDC(77)1

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether measures to deal with the effects of chemical and biological weapons will be included in the new circular HDC(77)1.

Mr. John Patten: The Government are a party to the 1972 convention banning biological weapons. In the absence of a chemical weapons ban, active consideration is being given to the detection and warning of danger presented by them and what protective measures can be taken. When the results of this work are available, we shall consider including in the general guidance to health authorities on civil defence planning specific advice on dealing with the effects of chemical weapons.

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to issue the new circular HDC(77)1.

Mr. John Patten: Officials have now been able to consider published and other views on a preliminary draft circular to replace the guidance in HDC(77)1 on civil defence planning in the National Health Service. These views are being taken into account in a further draft which will be issued for general consultation at the earliest possible date.

Furniture Payments (Inquiry)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether the Social Security Inspectorate's inquiry into single payments for furniture has now been finalised; and when he proposes to publish the report;

(2) whether the inspectorate's inquiry into single payments for furniture has now reached a stage at which it can tell him how many wrongful refusals of single payments for furniture were found in the course of the inquiry; what action has been taken to correct errors found; and with what results.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to her on 3 December 1984 at column 79. The Social Security Policy Inspectorate's report on its enquiry into single payments for furniture has just been delivered and we shall now be considering what action, if any, needs to be taken in the light of the report including the question of publication.

AIDS

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will bring forward proposals immediately requiring all blood donors to sign a declaration that they are not in a high-risk group for acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We must ensure that all those in the AIDS high risk groups are made aware that they should not donate. Transfusion centres have been told to distribute copies of our revised leaflet "AIDS — Important New Advice for Blood Donors".

Requiring all donors to sign a declaration will not materially increase the safeguards. However transfusion directors are free to adopt this procedure if they wish.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people have been monitored for acquired immune deficiency syndrome after acquiring HT LV-III from infected blood in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1984 monitoring was commenced of the three recipients of blood transfusions given by a donor who subsequently had developed AIDS; the transfusions took place in 1983(2) and 1984(1).

This same donor provided plasma from which Factor VIII was manufactured and given in 1984 to 38 haemophiliacs; the HTLV-III antibody status of these patients is being investigated.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that district and regional health authorities possess adequate resources to enable hospitals to adhere fully to the guidelines issued by his Department on acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. We are distributing nearly £500 million additional cash to regional health authorities in 1985-86. In addition we are expecting health authorities to produce cost improvement programmes yielding in excess of the £100 million identified this year.

Blood Products

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to make immediately available to all haemophilé units imported heat-treated factor VIII; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are currently considering a number of abridged applications for product licences for imported heat-treated factor VIII. Even before such licences are granted, heat-treated factor VIII is available for prescription by clinicians on a 'named patient' basis.

Blood Donors

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the design of the leaflet all blood donors are required to read before giving blood; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. In recent months we have revised the content of this leaflet to strengthen its message and to extend the categories of persons in AIDS high-risk groups who should not donate blood. This revised leaflet "AIDS"—Important New Advice for Blood Donors" has been printed and issued to regional transfusion centres for their use.

Statutory Sick Pay

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the present statutory sick pay scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Yes. The present statutory sick pay scheme is generally working well and a recent Social Security Policy Inspectorate study, a copy of which I have placed in the Library, indicates that most employees prefer it to the DHSS sickness benefit scheme. The Social Security Bill, which was recently considered by a Standing Committee of this House, provides for the extension of an employer's liability to pay statutory sick pay for his employees from 8 to 28 weeks with effect from 6 April 1986. A consultation paper on the extension was issued by the Department on 21 December 1984. A copy has also been placed in the Library.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for the design and distribution to local authorities of a poster advertising housing benefit.

Mr. Whitney: A poster advertising a leaflet "Who Pays Less Rent and Rates?" was distributed in March 1983 to all local authorities. In addition, local authorities receive subsidy for their expenses for operating the housing benefif scheme including the costs for publicity.

Alder Hey and Royal Liverpool Children's Hospital

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the proposal to make two wards at the Alder Hey children's hospital in Liverpool five-day wards.

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if there are any plans to alter the bed provision of the Alder Hey children's hospital and the Royal Liverpool children's hospital from seven-day wards to five-day wards.

Mr. John Patten: It is for health authorities to decide on the level of provision needed locally. The hon. Members may therefore care to write to the chairmen of Liverpool health authority about this.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to extend mobility allowance to disabled persons over 64 years of age; and what would be the cost to public funds of doing so.

Mr. Newton: Disabled people can already received mobility allowance up to age 75 provided that they satisfy the qualifying conditions before age 65 and claim before they reach age 66. We have no present plans to extend these age limits. The estimated cost of abolishing them altogether is £340 million a year.

Private Patient Changes

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether Bloomsbury health authority was one of those where the handling of private patient charges was examined by his Department's auditors.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The examination of the handling of private patients charges in Bloomsbury was carried out by the authority's own internal auditors with the assistance of guidance provided by our Department's auditor. He was satisfied with this review and the remedial action taken. The examination formed part of the wider review by our Department's auditors.

Overseas Patients

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of any actions taken by his Department or any health authority in order to encourage patients to come from overseas to receive private or other fee-paying treatment from the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There has been no such action by our Department nor, as far as we are aware, by any health authority.

Overseas Medical Services

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of any involvement by his Department or any health authority in medical services in Egypt, Saudi Arabia or elsewhere overseas.

Mr. John Patten: North-East Thames regional health authority provides administrative advice to the Ministry of Defence in connection with the agreement between the Government and Saudi Arabia under which the Ministry of Defence has appointed contractors to manage the King Khalid National Guard hospital in Jeddah. I am not aware of any other existing contracts.

Doddington Hospital

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what would be the effect on the local family practitioner services of general practitioners providing medical cover if the proposal to convert Doddington hospital into a unit for geriatrics goes ahead;

(2) whether the Peterborough health authority will pay general practitioners to provide medical cover if the Doddington hospital becomes a unit for geriatrics;

(3) whether the proposed transformation of Doddington hospital into a unit for geriatrics can take place without local general practitioners expressing their willingness to provide medical cover; whether the family practitioner committee's approval for this plan is needed; and whether the family practitioner committee has been consulted.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The proposal to change the use of Doddington hospital was one of several options canvassed by Peterborough health authority prior to finalising its strategic plan.

Health authority proposals including the manpower implications of planning options which involve family practitioner services must be pursued in collaboration with the family practitioner committee and the associated local representative committees. The hon. Member may care to contact these bodies concerning such arrangements at local level. I understand that no decisions have been taken regarding medical cover associated with the proposed change of use, nor concerning any possible effects on general medical services if this were provided by general practitioners. But if cover is to be provided in this way, I would expect the health authority and the family practitioner and local medical committees to continue to work together so that a conclusion is reached that takes hospital and family practitioner service needs into account.

If the proposed change took place it would be possible for Peterborough health authority to make arrangements for general practitioners to be paid for providing medical cover.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the proposal to convert Doddington hospital into a unit for geriatrics represents a change of policy by the Peterborough health authority.

Mr. John Patten: The hon. Member may care to contact the Peterborough health authority direct on their policy, as it is responsible for the management of services locally.

Registered Mental Nurses

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether Peterborough health authority has any difficulty in recruiting registered mental nurses;

(2) whether the savings calculated to accrue from the closure of the operating theatre facilities at Doddington hospital took into account the costs of transporting to Peterborough those needing surgery.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally. The hon. Member may care to contact the Peterborough health authority for details.

Mrs. Clarke (Attendance Allowance)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement as to the progress of the application received on 13 August by his Department at Bristol relating to a request for an attendance allowance by Mrs. Clarke, now aged 80 years, of Hotel Chateau Bellevue, Newton road, Totnes, Devon.

Mr. Newton: A decision, together with payment of arrears for the due period, was sent to Mrs. Clarke on 31 January. I am writing to my hon. Friend about the circumstances of this case.

Heating Allowance

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to allow claims for heating allowance by pensioners and other benefit recipients to be considered when the claimant is not in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Whitney: No. It would cost well over £500 million just to give basic rate supplementary benefit heating additions to pensioners not in receipt of supplementary benefit. The best way to use the available resources is to concentrate on helping those most in need by maintaining or increasing so far as possible the value of supplementary benefit rates. Between November 1978 and November 1984 the real value of the main rates of supplementary benefit increased by about 6 per cent. and over the same period the basic rate of heating addition increased by about 147 per cent. compared with an increase in fuel prices of about 108 per cent. We expect to spend some £400 million on heating additions this financial year, which is about £140 million more in real terms than was spent in 1978-79.

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the daily temperature in the city of Aberdeen during the period 21 January to 28 January as reported to his Department for the purpose of assessing eligibility for single payment heating allowance.

Mr. Whitney: The information provided for the chief adjudication officer by the Meteorological Office for the purpose of operating regulation 26 of the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations is expressed in degree days for calendar weeks ending on Saturday. A degree day is the daily difference in degrees between a base temperature level at which it is estimated a building requires heating (15·5°C) and the 24 hour mean outside temperture. It is widely used as a measure of temperature over time. The total of degree days for the week ending Saturday 26 January for the weather station at Aberdeen (Dyce) was 110·2. This represents an average temperature over the week of −0·24°C.

Pharmaceutical Industry Branch

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the total annual cost of the pharmaceutical industry branch of his Department;

(2) if he will give a breakdown by grade and by salary of the numbers of staff in the pharmaceutical industry branch of his Department;

(3) what is the purpose of the pharmaceutical industry branch of his Department;

(4) when the pharmaceutical industry branch of his Department commenced work at 14 Russell Square; and where they were based before then;

(5) if he will show in diagramatic form the administrative structure of the pharmaceutical industry branch of his Department;

(6) what is the position, grade and salary of Mr. A. R. Long of the pharmaceutical branch of his Department; and what are his duties and responsibilities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Department's pharmaceutical industry branch, headed by Mr. J. R. Long, assistant secretary, has in addition 4 principals, 4 higher executive officers, 1 executive officer, 2 clerical officers and a personal secretary. The salaries for the various grades are set out in the Civil Service pay and conditions of service code, a copy of which is in the Library: the total annual salary cost is £173,264. The main functions of the branch are, under the direction of Ministers, to run the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme and to exercise the Department's responsibilities for sponsorship of the pharmaceutical industry. The branch draws, as necessary, on other parts of the Department for accountancy, legal and other advice. In its existing and previous forms, the branch has been located at Russell square for over 20 years.

Population and Pensioners (Statistics)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report an outline of the considerations which led to the ratio of contributors to pensioners published in the Government Actuary's contribution to "Population, Pension Costs and Pensioners' Incomes" being revised to 2·3 in 1984-85 and 1·8 in 2025-26 from the figures of 2·4 in 1985-86 and 2·1 in 2025-26, as given in the 1982 Review.

Mr. Whitney: The difference between the two sets of estimates is almost entirely due to the revision of projections of the number of people over pension age to reflect a fall in mortality rates which took place between the mid-1979 official projections used in the report of the Government Actuary on the long-term financial estimates for the national insurance fund published in 1982, and the mid-1981 official projections used in "Population, Pension Costs and Pensioners' Insurances" published in 1984 (see paragraph 4 of that report).

Employment Offices (Computers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people will be employed by Honeywell to supply terminals and microcomputers for employment offices under the £33 million order which it won from his Department.

Mr. Whitney: This is a matter for Honeywell Information Systems Ltd.

Computerisation (Staff Losses)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provisions he will make for present employees of his Department who will lose their jobs resulting from computerisation of the employment benefit and social security system.

Mr. Whitney: We do not at present anticipate that the computerisation of social security operations will result in any compulsory redundancies. Any staffing implications in the Department of Employment are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

"Poverty"

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his response to the publication entitled "Poverty", a copy of which has been sent to him, by the Child Poverty Action Group, on proposals for child benefit improvement in the event of possible direct taxation cuts in the forthcoming budget.

Mr. Whitney: The views expressed in the publication will be considered along with the representations which are usually received by the Government prior to the Budget and prior to the subsequent announcement of the future levels of social security benefits.

Doctors (Medical Experience)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to ensure that sufficient experienced doctors are available to deal with acquired immune deficiency syndrome, Legionnaires' disease and Lassa fever infections.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There is an adequate supply of appropriately trained doctors nationally to treat patients with these diseases and it is for health authorities to determine their medical staffing levels in the light of local needs and priorities. Developments in patient care for those suffering from these conditions, and dissemination of good clinical practice, rest largely with the medical profession. However, we are taking a keen interest in developments and will take any steps we consider necessary to ensure that health authorities have access to the best advice available.

Supplementary Benefit

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which categories of supplementary benefit claimants will be receiving reduced allowances within the next two years resulting from his recent proposals to amend allocations.

Mr. Whitney: I assume the hon. Member is referring to our proposals to control supplementary benefit expenditure on people in board and lodging accommodation. We are not at this stage in a position to say how categories of claimants will be affected because we have yet to receive and consider the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee following its consultation on the proposals.

Abortions

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of all abortions were performed under the National Health Service in each of the following years: 1968, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is shown in the table.

Abortions performed under the National Health Service as percentage of all abortions in England and Wales, 1968, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1982 and 1983

Percentages

1975	48·0	0·6	36·6
1980	47·0	0·7	37·8
1982	48·5	0·4	38·4
1983	49·2	0·6	38·7

* 27 April to 31 December.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of all maternal deaths resulted from (a) abortion and (b) sepsis which may have arisen from either legal or illegal abortions, in each of the following years: 1950, 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is shown in the table.

Number of deaths from (a) abortion and (b) abortion with sepsis, and as percentages of all maternal deaths in the years 1950, 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1983 in England and Wales.

Year	Abortions total		With Sepsis		All maternal deaths
	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.
1950	103	16·6	64	10·3	620
1960	62	20·0	33	10·6	310
1965	52	23·5	29	13·1	221
1970	32	21·9	21	14·4	146
1975	8	10·4	1	1·3	77
1980	3	4·8	2	3·2	62
1983	2	4·2	1	2·1	48

The figures do not distinguish between spontaneous and other forms of abortion.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many discharges from hospitals there were following diagnosis of septic abortion in each of the following years: 1967, 1968, 1969, 1975, 1980, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of abortions performed in the private sector in each of the following years: 1968, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1982 and 1984; and what percentage of this total was performed by (a) the Pregnancy Advisory Service and (b) the British Pregnancy Advisory Service in each of those years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of abortions notified as performed in non-NHS premises is shown in the table. It is not possible to determine the percentage performed by the Pregnancy Advisory Service and the British Pregnancy Advisory Service from the notifications.

Number of abortions performed in non-NHS premises, residents and non-residents for 1968, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1982 and 1984, England and Wales

Merseyside Take-up Campaign

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he can now provide detailed statistics for each local office of his Department within Merseyside on the results of the 1983 Merseyside county council take-up campaign; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The following information is now available for the local offices in the Merseyside area:

Single Payments

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will arrange for tables showing the single payments made by each local office in December 1984 to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Whitney: I am arranging for the information to be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Drug Prescribing (Policy Revision)

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why a revision of the policy in relation to drug prescribing was not identified as a policy task in the document, "The Function, Staffing and Management of the DHSS", issued in August 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The policy tasks referred to in the document were intended to be an illustrative selection. As the document points out, we have been undertaking a comprehensive re-examination of the programmes for which ny right hon. Friend is responsible. General medical practitioners' prescribing is shown as one of the main responsibilities of the divisions concerned in their management accounts for the current period, copies of which were placed in the Library in July 1984

General Practice Finance Corporation

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the chairman of the General Medical Services Committee expressing concern about the Government's decision on the General Practice Finance Corporation's net borrowing in 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I met representatives of the General Medical Services Committee on 16 January to discuss this subject amongst others. The corporation's net borrowing for 1985-86 is fixed at £22·5 million compared with £12·5 million as recently as 1983-84. I agreed to take note of the points made by the General Medical Services Committee in considering the position for future years.

West Midlands RHA (Review)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which official of his Department will sit on the steering committee which will guide the review by outside consultants of the functions and working of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our representative will be a member of our regional liaison division.

NHS (Drugs Bill)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recommendations have been made to him by the British Medical Association to reduce the size of the National Health Service drugs bill; and what response he has made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In my recent meeting with the British Medical Association, its representatives stated that they share the Government's aim of encouraging economic prescribing. They are now proposing a scheme of voluntary generic substitution but this would not produce such immediate and worthwhile savings on the drugs bill as our limited list proposals.

Surrogate Motherhood Agencies

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress he has made in developing policy on surrogate motherhood and surrogate agencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 14 January at column 63.

Portable Cordless Telephones

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department will seek to obtain details of the findings of recent research done in the United States of America into the effects on hearing of portable cordless telephones.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 53]: I understand that the United States Consumer Product Safety Commission carried out an investigation into the possible hearing hazards of cordless telephones. There had been 20 specific complaints up to October 1983 reporting painful ringing headaches and disorientation. Complaints about hearing losses were sometimes associated with them. Laboratory tests on five models of cordless telephones determined the damaging sound levels to be in a range of 123dB to 135dB.

There has been some evidence that problems may result from improper use of the equipment and, in America, some warning literature and stickers have been instituted. British Telecom claims that its cordless telephones avoid these problems of acoustic shock.

Prescribed Medicines

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the National Health Service budget was represented by the cost of prescribed medicines in 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 57]: The proportion of total National Health Service expenditure attributable to the cost of drugs (excluding the cost of dispensing) was :

1970	10·9
1975	7·8
1980	9·6

Note: Over the period there were small differences in the way the basic information was assembled.

AIDS (Nurses)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service nurses have contracted acquired immune deficiency syndrome resulting from close contact with hospital patients suffering from this disease.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 363]: None.

Drug Prescriptions and Hospital Treatment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies he intends to conduct to examine the correlation of drug prescribing levels with delays in hospital treatment for patients within the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 365]: We see no need to mount such a study.

General Practitioner Surgeries

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he intends to make available to general practitioner surgeries to improve ease of access to premises, consulting room facilities, internal waiting areas and seating and standards of lighting, heating and ventilation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 365]: Financial assistance is available to general practitioners making such improvements to their premises under the improvement grant scheme. Under this scheme eligible doctors receive by way of grant one third of the actual cost to them of approved work and associated statutory and professional fees.

A temporary scheme for enhanced improvement grants was introduced on 1 November 1983, which will run until 31 October 1986. Additional funds have been made available under this scheme to enable doctors in selected inner city areas of England to receive improvement grants amounting to 60 per cent. of the cost of approved work and related fees. It is intended that the higher level of grants should be used to assist general practitioners in premises where the basic facilities (for example toilet and washing facilities, waiting room, heating, lighting and ventilation) are in greatest need of improvement.

Amenity and Pay Beds

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the number of National Health Service amenity beds, deaths and discharges of patients and average daily occupancy, giving numbers and percentages, for each region for each of the last five years;

(2) what is the number of authorised National Health Service pay beds, deaths and discharges of patients, average daily occupancy, giving numbers and percentages, for each region for each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 359]: The available information is given in the tables. Percentage occupancy is not a useful statistic in this context as amenity and pay beds can also be occupied by patients who are not amenity or private patients. It has therefore not been included.

Ex-prisoners (Accommodation)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received any applications from the National Association of Probation Officers for financial assistance in providing accommodation for rehabilitating ex-offenders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

No, but the association has made representations about the decision not to provide additional resources for new after-care accommodation places in 1985-86 and possibly thereafter, and it has also submitted comments on the current review of the voluntary after-care accommodation scheme. These will be taken into account in the review.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 5 February 1985

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Privy Council Office

Mr. Proctor asked the Lord Privy Seal what has been the cost of administration of the Privy Council Office expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Biffen: The cost of administration of the Privy Council Office expressed in 1983-84 prices in the last five years was as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	1·0
1980-81	1·2
1981-82	1·0
1982-83	1·0
1983-84	1·0

Parliamentary Journalists

Mr. Madden asked the Lord Privy Seal what is the latest figure for journalists accredited to work within the House; how many are employed by newspapers; and how many are employed by broadcasting organisations.

Mr. Biffen: There are at present 301 journalists accredited to the Parliamentary Press Gallery to work within the House. Of these, 187 are employed directly by newspapers and 54 are employed by broadcasting organisations. The balance are employed by news agencies.

PRIME MINISTER

Hatfield

Q37. Mr. Murphy asked the Prime Minister if she will pay a visit to the parish of Hatfield.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Clachan of Campsie

Q67. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Clachan of Campsie.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

War Widows

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what recent representations she has received from British war widows and associates; what reply she is sending about the particular case raised; if there is any action she will be taking; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have received a letter from the president of the British War Widows Associates about one of their members. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Services has replied and a copy has been sent to the right hon. Member.

Engagements

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

Mr. Beith asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 5 February.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Oil Prices

Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister whether she will have talks with the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries with a view to stabilising world oil prices.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy maintains frequent contacts with representatives of other oil producing countries, including members of OPEC.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Aerospace Industry

81. Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about employment prospects within the aerospace industry.

Mr. Butcher: Employment prospects in the aerospace industry depend primarily on the industry's own ability to compete effectively in domestic and international markets. The industry has a successful record in this respect, and I hope that it will build on this in the future.

82. Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the number of people employed in the aerospace industry.

Mr. Butcher: Is is estimated that there were, in November 1984, 163,600 employees in the United Kingdom aerospace industry (as defined by activity heading 3640 of the 1980 Standard Industrial Classification). This figure does not include employment on aviation electronics, which the Society of British Aerospace Companies has estimated at some 35,000.

Teaching Company Scheme

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will bring forward proposals for the development of teaching company schemes within the tourist industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: A major review of the teaching company scheme is now being undertaken under the direction of the Teaching Company Management Committee. One of the issues which will be considered is the scope and growth prospects for the scheme. The case for an extension of the scheme into new industrial and commercial sectors, including the tourism sector, will be examined as part of the review.

Cleveland

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the number of public limited companies with a turnover of £1 million per annum which have their headquarters in Cleveland.

Mr. Fletcher: According to the records held by the Registrar of Companies, three public limited companies have their registered offices in Cleveland. They, and their most recent notified turnovers, are Amos Hinton & Sons PLC (£125 million), E Upton & Sons PLC (£5·7 million) and Marlborough Technical Management PLC (£7·6 million for eight months ended 31 March 1984 only). Records are not maintained, however, to identify any company operating in Cleveland whose registered office is elsewhere.

Kettering (Industrial Assistance)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what grants under section 8 of the Industry Act 1972 have been made since that date in the borough of Kettering.

Mr. Trippier: The total assistance which has been offered under section 8 of the Industry Act 1972 and the Industrial Development Act 1982 (which consolidated the earlier legislation and subsequent amendments) to firms in the borough of Kettering is approximately £1·2 million. This total comprises offers made under the following section 8 schemes:

	£000
Investment Incentive Scheme for the UK Instrumentation and Automation Industry	59
Clothing Industry Scheme	135
Energy Conservation Scheme	6
Ferrous Foundary Industry Scheme	24
Footwear Manufacturing Industry Scheme	470
Computer-Aided Design and Test Equipment Support	35
Machine Tool Industry Scheme	57
Assistance to the Non-Ferrous Foundary Industry	55
Assistance to the Printing Machinery Industry	254
Redmeat Slaughterhouse Industry Scheme	13
Small Engineering Firms Investment Scheme	21
Small Engineering Firms Investment Scheme (2)	90

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his forecast of the percentage increase in manufacturing output in 1984; and how this compares with the percentage increase in imports of manufactures.

Mr. Channon: My Department does not provide economic forecasts. Published figures indicate that the index of output of manufacturing industries was 3 per cent. higher in the first 11 months of 1984 than in the corresponding period a year earlier. In 1984 as a whole the import volume index of manufactured goods was some 10 per cent. higher than in 1983.

Manufacturing Industry (Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing United Kingdom imports from the EEC in 1983 as a proportion of the output of United Kingdom manufacturing industry for each standard industrial classification class and the corresponding figure for 1975.

Mr. Channon: What information is available is given in the following table:

	Standard Industrial Classification	*Ratio of imports from EC to sales by UK manufacturers (per cent.) †
	class	1975	1983
Metals	21 and 22	13	22
Other minerals and mineral products	23 and 24	8	10
Chemicals and man-made fibres	25 and 26	11	21
Metal goods	31	4	7
Mechanical engineering	32	11	17
Office machinery and data processing equipment	33	39	75
Electrical and electronic engineering	34	10	18
Motor vehicles and parts	35	13	50
Other transport equipment	36	15	13
Instrument engineering	37	20	25
Food, drink and tobacco	41 and 42	7	7
Textiles	43	9	27
Leather and leather goods	44	9	18
Clothing and footwear	45	8	18
Timber and wooden furniture	46	5	10
Paper, printing and publishing	47	3	6
Rubber and plastics	48	8	17
Other manufacturing industries	49	23	46

Notes

* UK manufacturers' sales are of the principal products of each class, excluding where possible sales of waste products and receipts for work done.

† The information shown in the table is not comparable with the import penetration ratios published by the Department of Trade and Industry in Business Monitor MQ12. The Department's ratios show imports as a proportion of UK home demand, defined as sales by UK manufacturers plus imports less exports.

Cornwall

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total amount of regional development grants paid to companies in Cornwall during the financial year 1983-84.

Mr. Trippier: £2,252,000. This figure includes all amounts over £25,000 paid in Cornwall in the financial year 1983-84. Grant payments of £25,000 or less cannot be attributed to any unit smaller than a planning region. Figures are not available for grant paid only to companies by county.

EC (Cinematograph Films)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which members of the European Community have failed to enact legislation equivalent to the provisions of section 8 of the European Communities Act 1972 relating to cinematograph films; what action has been taken by him to achieve uniformity in that respect; and whether he intends to seek a revision of the legislation following the abolition of the Eady levy on the exhibition of films in United Kingdom cinemas.

Mr. Trippier: Section 8 of the European Communities Act 1972 permitted films from other member states to qualify as British quota films for the purposes of the Films Acts, amended the definition of British films and introduced a new category of "Community Films" in the films register. The Films Bill at present before the House will remove the legislative basis of the quota (which was suspended on 1 January 1983) and the Eady levy. Section 8 of the 1972 Act will therefore in these respects be redundant and the Films Bill proposes its repeal.

The EC Commission takes the view that some aspects of the films legislations of Denmark, France, Italy and West Germany are, variously, incompatible with those states' treaty obligations, and there are cases against them. I understand that the Commission is continuing its discussions with the states concerned and United Kingdom officials are in touch periodically with the Commission about these cases.

WALES

Departmental Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total cost of administration of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: It is estimated that the departmental running costs (including notional pensions liability) of the Welsh Office in real terms for the last five years have been as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	34·0
1980-81	34·0
1981-82	33·4
1982-83	32·5
1983-84	34·8

The real terms figures are those for cash outturn adjusted to 1983-84 price levels by excluding the effect of general inflation as measured by the GDP deflator.

The increase shown for 1983-84 is largely accounted for by a change in the method of assessing accommodation expenditure from 1 April 1983.

Key Workers (Houses)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what is his estimate of the number of key workers' houses which are owned by (a) the Mid-Wales Development Agency, (b) the Welsh Development Agency and (c) local authorities in Wales; and how many of these are currently standing empty;

(2) what is his estimate of the annual cost to public authorities in Wales, in terms of loss of rent, in holding key worker houses empty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The ready availability of houses for key workers is important for industrial development and job creation. At 31 December 1984 the Development Board for Rural Wales owned 49 houses specifically for key workers, of which 17 were empty, though seven of these had been allocated. It is estimated that the loss of rent during the current financial year will be £15,000. In addition, housing associations and local authorities in Mid Wales identify houses to which, for a limited time and in return for a guarantee of rent, they give the board nomination rights for key worker tenants. There were 35 such houses at 31 December 1984, of which 15 were empty. Rent guarantee payments made by the board are estimated at £16,000 in the current financial year.

The Welsh Development Agency does not provide housing for key workers. It owns a small number of houses originally provided for key workers but no longer used for that purpose.

Information on key worker dwellings owned by local authorities throughout Wales is not collected centrally.

Electronics (Qualifications)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people obtained a Technical Education Council certificate in electronics in each year since 1980 in Wales; of these what proportion subsequently obtained employment within (a) six months and (b) 12 months; and how many are currently unemployed.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information is not available centrally.

Hilldene Clinic and Grosvenor House Hostel

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what inspections have been carried out by health authorities of the Hilldene clinic and the Grosvenor house hostel in north Wales concerning hygiene and safety; and if he is satisfied with such inspections;

(2) if he is satisfied that circular HN(84)22 is being operated by Hilldene clinic and Grosvenor house hostel in relation to spending money of residents.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The power to register and inspect private nursing homes and mental nursing homes has been delegated to health authorities. The hon. Member should direct any inquiries about the Hilldene clinic in the first instance to the Clwyd health authority, which is its registering authority.

I am unaware of the existence of a Grosvenor house hostel in north Wales, but a Grosvenor house old people's home is registered as a private residential care home by Clwyd county council, which is responsible for the registration, inspection and monitoring of such establishments. Inquiries concerning this home should be directed in the first instance to the council.

I shall write to the hon. Member about the administration of patients spending money as set out in Welsh Office health notice WHN(84)21.

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether any of the Welsh water authority's 940 jobs whose incumbents have been given voluntary redundancy over the past five years have subsequently been left vacant and how many have been filled; and whether any of the persons granted voluntary redundancy have subsequently been re-employed into these or other jobs with the authority.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I regret that the information requested is not held in central records. The question is one for the chairman of the Welsh water authority. I am asking the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Authorities (Pensions)

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police authorities of England and Wales, showing which allow national service and cadet service to count towards pensions.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I do not have the information requested, but I shall be writing to my hon. Friend.

Drug Addicts, Warwickshire

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of registered drug addicts in Warwickshire.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information on narcotic drug addicts notified to the Home Office in Warwickshire relates to 1983 and is given in tables 3.11-3.13 of "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs, United Kingdom, Supplementary Tables, 1983", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Interpol

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the liaison of British police forces with Interpol in the fight to combat crimes involving narcotics, is proving effective.

Mr. Giles Shaw: International police co-operation through Interpol is one means whereby the United Kingdom is tackling international traffic in illicit drugs. I understand that co-operation through Interpol has led to an increased number of arrests and of seizures of illicit drugs and we are satisfied that it provides a valuable source of assistance to the police. The international problem cannot be tackled by the police through Interpol alone: the Government's strategy involves activity on a broad front in which Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has a valuable contribution to make in combating illegal importation.

TV Licence Fee

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many convictions for television licence fee evasion there have been in each calendar year for the past five years; and how many cases were dismissed;

(2) in each of the past five calendar years, how many people have been successfully prosecuted for television licence fee evasion; and if he will break this figure down on a regional basis.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of convictions and acquittals was as follows:

	Convictions	Acquittals
1980	61,417	941
1981	67,299	504
1982	80,979	268
1983	93,827	284
1984	108,830	313

The regional distribution of convictions was:

Region	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
London	10,382	11,470	13,194	14,461	16,721
South East	3,349	4,469	5,442	6,594	7,392
South West	6,986	6,923	9,792	9,925	10,732
Eastern	3,072	3,851	4,803	6,755	8,499
Midland	7,569	8,668	10,947	13,860	18,577
North East	12,556	13,941	15,901	16,006	17,936
North West	8,403	9,315	10,395	11,529	12,938
Wales and Marches	4,354	4,434	5,582	7,527	7,788
Scotland	4,726	4,148	4,628	6,643	7,619
Northern Ireland	20	80	295	527	628
	61,417	67,299	80,979	93,827	108,830

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many of those convicted of television licence fee evasion during the last five years had been unemployed for over one year;

(2) how many of those prosecuted in each of the past five calendar years for alleged television licence fee evasion have been retirement pensioners.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information of this kind about the circumstances of persons convicted of television licence evasion is not available.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in each of the past five years, what has been the average fine imposed on people convicted of television licence fee evasion.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information about the level of fines imposed for the special offence of television licence evasion is not kept routinely and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much income the Post Office has received in payment for collecting television licence fees in each of the past five calendar years; and how much this was in each year as a percentage of the full amount of fees collected.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Payments to the Post Office for television licensing work in the last five financial years, including VAT and adjustments for under or overpayments in previous years, and the proportion these payments represent of the total licence fee revenue in each year are as follows:

1980	31·5	7·3
1981	28·8	5·4
1982	38·8	6·4
1983	54·3	7·3
1984	49·8	6·5

Immigrants Advisory Service

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied that his Department's level of funding to the United Kingdom immigrants' advisory service is sufficient to enable that organisation to operate a translation service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I am satisfied that the grant-in-aid to the United Kingdom immigrants advisory service is sufficient to enable it to provide advice or assistance for, or other services for the welfare of, persons who have rights of appeal under part II of the Immigration Act 1971. This includes the cost of translations necessary in pursuit of these functions.

Citizenship

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were granted British citizenship in 1984; and how this compares with the last 10 years.

Mr. Waddington: The information for 1984 is not yet available but will be published in the form of a Home Office statistical bulletin later in the year. Figures for 1983 and previous years were published in table C of the White Paper "Tables of Persons Acquiring British Citizenship 1983", (Cmnd. 9331).

Polling Stations

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requirements he prescribes for providing and operating a polling station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The various requirements concerning the provision and operation of polling stations with which returning officers and their staff must comply at parliamentary elections are prescribed by schedule 1 to the Representation of the People Act 1983. Similar requirements are prescribed for local government elections by the Local Elections (Principal Areas) Rules 1973 and the Local Elections (Parishes and Communities) Rules 1973 (as amended).

Passport Offices

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the plans to reduce staff at the Liverpool passport office.

Mr. Waddington: There are no immediate plans to reduce the number of staff at the Liverpool passport office. The hon. Member will be aware from my right hon. and learned Friend's statement on 24 July 1984, at column 567, of the decision to accept the recommendation of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the subsequent Rayner review of the passports offices, to computerise the issue of passports. As well as providing a speedier service to the travelling public, computerisation is expected to show some staff savings, but these cannot yet be quantified.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff were employed in the Liverpool passport office in May 1979; what were the figures at the latest date; and what is the proposed establishment.

Mr. Waddington: On 1 May 1979 there were 209 staff (including 29 casuals) in post at the Liverpool passport office; on 1 February 1985 the figure was 192 (including five casuals). The authorised complement of 206 is unlikely to change in the immediate future unless there is a significant change in demand for passport services.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations have taken place with the Civil Service unions concerning proposed reductions in staff employed in passport offices.

Mr. Waddington: The Home Office trade union side has been consulted about the full computer study now in progress. It has been assured that further discussions will take place before any implementation programme is considered.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were employed in the passport offices in England and Wales in May 1979; and what was the figure at the latest available date.

Mr. Waddington: On 1 May 1979 there were 941 staff (including 156 casuals) in post at passport offices in England and Wales; on 28 January 1985 the figure was 831 (including 19 casuals).

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of (a) applications for passports and (b) other items of business transacted at the Liverpool passport office in each of the past five years.

Mr. Waddington: The following table gives statistics of the passport services provided by the Liverpool passport office in each of the past five years.

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Standard passports issued	571,799	429,969	538,855	489,775	478,887
94 page passports issued	3,213	2,984	3,557	3,126	2,653
Renewals and extensions	14,730	14,043	17,233	17,652	20,304
Amendments	24,946	20,739	27,021	30,054	28,952

Collective passports issued	4,143	3,557	4,231	3,872	4,048
Re-entry visas granted	5,784	3,328	5,547	6,000	5,261

Prison Visits Scheme

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department who decides the amounts to be paid for meals and overnight accommodation under the assisted prison visits scheme.

Mr. Mellor: The Department of Health and Social Security administers this scheme on behalf of the Home Office and its local offices determine subsistence payments in individual cases. I understand that the rates are broadly the same as for similar claims under the supplementary benefit scheme.

EMPLOYMENT

GCHQ

11. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has had with the International Labour Organisation over the most recent industrial dispute involving employees at the Government Communications Headquarters and their conditions of service.

Mr. Tom King: The Government responded on 4 January to the International Labour Organisation's invitation to comment on the report of the Committee on the Freedom of Association.

Parental Leave

13. Ms Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will take steps to implement the European Economic Community proposals on parental leave.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The proposals—in the form of a draft directive on parental leave and leave for family reasons—are under consideration within the European Community Council of Ministers. The Government have made clear their serious reservations about this and some other Commission proposals in the employment field.

Labour Statistics

15. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment what new initiatives he is considering to reduce the level of youth unemployment.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government are considering a number of options for the enhancement of provision for young people, including the possibilities of extending training opportunities.

16. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been out of work for more than two years.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, a total of 761,000 claimants had been unemployed in the United Kingdom for more than two years.

25. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been out of work for over 12 months to the latest available date; and what were the comparable figures in May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table gives the available information for the United Kingdom. Figures are given for registered unemployed in April 1979 (not available for May) and in October 1982, and for unemployed claimants in October 1982 and January 1985.

The comparison is affected by the change in the basis of the unemployment count in October 1982 and by the 1983 Budget provisions which mean that some men mainly aged 60 years and over, not longer need to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits.

Unemployed for over 52 weeks—United Kingdom

April 1979	366,711
October 1982	1,169,558
Unemployed claimants
October 1982	989,306
January 1985	1,316,074

36. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been unemployed for more than 12 months; and what were the comparable figures for January 1979, January 1980, January 1981, January 1982, January 1983 and January 1984.

42. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been unemployed for more than 12 months; and what were the comparable figures in January for each of the past six years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table gives the figures at January of each year for Great Britain. The comparisons are affected by the change in the basis of the unemployment count in October 1982 and also by the 1983 budget provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 and over, no longer need to sign on at an unemployment benefit office in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits.

Unemployed over one year

37. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the percentage of unemployed young people under the age of 25 years in the European Economic Community as a whole; and how this compares with the figure for 1978.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In November 1984 39·6 per cent. of those unemployed in the European Community (excluding Greece) were aged under 25 years, as estimated by the statistical office of the European Communities. Comparable figures are not available for 1978.

50. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been unemployed for over 24 months; and what were the comparable figures for April 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table gives the available information for the United Kingdom. Figures are given for registered unemployed in April 1979 and October 1982, and for unemployed claimants in October 1982 and January 1985.

The comparison is affected by the change in the basis of the unemployment count in October 1982 and by the 1983 Budget provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 years and over, no longer need to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits.

65. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current percentage of people unemployed; and what are the numbers involved.

74. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the present numbers of unemployed in the United Kingdom; and what percentage this is of the work force.

75. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest level of unemployment.

76. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the number of unemployed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,341,000, which represents an unemployment rate of 13·9 per cent.

70. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what conclusions he has drawn from the unemployment statistics since the last quarter commenced for the calendar year 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: Recent statistics, including those for January, indicate that unemployment continues to rise. The seasonally adjusted level of unemployment rose by an average of 9,000 a month in the three months to January 1985. This compares with an average monthly increase of 15,000 in the previous three months.

56. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the trend in unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: Recent figures indicate that unemployment continues to rise. The latest statistics indicate that the seasonally adjusted level of unemployment rose by an average of 9,000 a month in the 3 months to January.

Community Programme

17. Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any proposals to extend the provisions of the community programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The community programme has now reached its target for providing 130,000 jobs for long-term unemployed people. We will continue to review its operation and make whatever changes are necessary.

21. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will include private street works in the eligibility criteria for the Manpower Services Commission's community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: All proposals to fund community programme projects are considered in the light of guidance about priorities for selection, the number of places available in each area and the local needs of long-term unemployed people. Projects must provide practical benefits for the community and involve work which would not otherwise be done, but there is no specific restriction preventing private street works.

47. Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently employed under the community programme.

63. Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of adults at present on the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 14 December, the latest date for which figures are available, 130,027 people were in jobs funded under the community programme. All were aged 18 or over.

67. Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further representations he has received about the recently announced changes in the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: During the six months since my right hon. Friend announced the changes to the community programme, on 30 July 1984 at cols. 121-2, we have received some 350 letters. I have also met Lady Platt, Chairman of the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Youth Training Scheme

18. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the expected level of take-up of the youth training scheme for 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Our current forecast is that there will be about 380,000 entrants to the youth training scheme in 1984-85.

22. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employers have been found to be at fault in cases involving youth training scheme trainees; and how many have been informed that they will not be allowed to participate further within the scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information is not available centrally on the number or providers and sponsors whose continued participation in the youth training scheme was considered inappropriate.

31. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future financial arrangements under the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend is currently considering the recommendations submitted to him by the Manpower Services Commission about the financial arrangements for the scheme in 1985-86.

Job Release Scheme

19. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on the operation of early job release schemes.

Mr. Alan Clark: As my right hon. Friend announced to the House on 12 November 1984, the full-time job release scheme will continue on the present basis for a further year. The part-time job release scheme is being revised to make it more attractive to both employers and employees, and details will be announced shortly.

34. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently taking advantage of the job release scheme; and what was the comparable figure for each of the past six years.

Mr. Alan Clark: At 2 January 1985, 78,642 people were in receipt of an allowance under the job release schemes.

The comparable January figures requested are as follows:

Job Release Scheme

	Number
1984	88,305
1983	76,876
1982	53,878
1981	61,451
1980	57,158
1979	42,871

Job Applicants (Age Limits)

20. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to introduce legislation to make it illegal to impose age limits on job applicants.

Mr. Alan Clark: None. We do not believe that legislating against age discrimination would be beneficial or practical.

Privatisation

23. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current estimated savings of his Department for 1984-85 as a result of privatisation schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No function performed by this Department has been transferred to the private sector during 1984-85. However, a number of support services are currently contracted out to private enterprise and scope for extending the range is regularly reviewed. Savings are estimated to be not less than £500,000.

Skillcentres

24. Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received over the proposed closure of skillcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Since my right hon. Friend's statement in the House about the skillcentre proposals made to the Manpower Services Commission by the skillcentre training agency, my right hon. Friend and I have received some 120 letters on the subject and met four delegations.

55. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the present proposals for the skillcentre network.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The proposals in the Manpower Services Commission paper, MSC/84/66, a copy of which is in the Library, were endorsed by the Commission on 24 January. My right hon. Friend and I are considering the Commission's conclusions and will of course keep the House informed.

77. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to confirm the decision over the future of Manpower Services Commission skillcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I are considering the conclusions of the Manpower Services Commission on the future of the skillcentre network, and we will of course keep the House informed.

Bradford

26. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Employment what he is doing to reduce unemployment in Bradford.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are concerned about the level of unemployment in Bradford and a substantial number of people in the area are benefiting from our special employment and training measures. We are committed to maintaining our economic policies, which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing, while encouraging enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. That is the only way to generate lasting jobs in Bradford and elsewhere.

Training Schemes

27. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is (a) the latest figure of unemployed, (b) the number of those unemployed for over one year and (c) the number of people on Government training schemes.

Mr. Alan Clark: At 10 January 1985 there were 3,341,000 unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom of whom, 1,316,000 people had been unemployed for over one year.

At 31 December the provisional figure for people in training on the youth training scheme was 301,896. At 30 November, the latest date for which figures are available 33,335 people were in training on the training opportunities scheme.

It is estimated that for 1984-85 as a whole, around 132,000 people will be helped through the Government's adult training schemes (including the training opportunities scheme).

Married Women

28. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the approximate increase in the employment of married women for the past year.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret that this information is not available. An estimate of the change between the spring of 1983 and the spring of 1984 will be made when the results of the 1984 labour force survey become available.

Youth Training Scheme (Allowances)

29. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the extent to which managing agents are topping up youth training scheme allowances.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I regret that comprehensive information is not available. Such information as is available indicates that only a small number of managing agents top up the level of the youth training scheme allowance.

Wages Inspectors

30. Mr. Torney asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to increase the number of wages inspectors.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are no plans for an increase.

New Technology (Training)

32. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will extend training opportunities in new technology for people made redundant from traditional industries.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As part of the Government's adult training strategy, our training programmes are being concentrated increasingly on skills which are likely to be in real demand, including new technology skills. Unemployed people and those who are about to be made redundant will benefit substantially from these changes.

Disabled People

33. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent reaction he has received to the code of practice for the employment of disabled people.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since the new code of practice was formally launched by the Prime Minister on 14 November, the Manpower Services Commission's disablement advisory service has been promoting it among employers throughout the country. Initial indications are that it is being favourably received both by employers and by organisations representing disabled people. In addition both my right hon. Friend and the chairman of the commission have received a very positive response from the chairmen of major companies to whom they wrote immediately following the launch, seeking support for the code.

The hon. Gentleman will welcome the fact that the code has been endorsed by the Select Committee on Employment, the National Advisory Council on the Employment of Disabled People, the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation, the CBI and the TUC.

The Manpower Services Commission will continue closely to monitor the response to the code.

Employment Act 1982

35. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is satisfied with the operation of section 1 of the Employment Act 1982 enjoining public companies to include in their annual reports a statement of their communication, consultation and involvement policy.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The reports which have been seen so far tend to confirm previous research evidence that employee involvement arrangements in companies are very widespread and take a great variety of forms. Some reports are however disappointing and the Government will continue to encourage companies to make full use of the opportunity which section 1 offers to review and, where necessary, improve their employee involvement arrangements.

Amble (Travel-to-Work Area)

38. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Employment what advice he received from the centre for urban and regional studies at Newcastle university about the placing of Amble in a travel-to-work area extending across the whole of the Alnwick district council area.

Mr. Alan Clark: The centre for urban and regional development studies collaborated with the Department in last year's review of the travel-to-work areas and in developing the methodology described in the supplement to the September 1984 edition of Employment Gazette, a copy of which is in the Library. The new travel-to-work area of Alnwick and Amble is smaller than the previous travel-to-work area of Alnwick which also contained the Amble area.

Minimum Weekly Wage

39. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to provide for a statutory minimum weekly wage.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. A national minimum wage would raise employers' costs and threaten jobs, including the jobs of those it was designed to help.

Strike Ballots

40. Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will initiate discussions with trade union leaders on the balloting of members before strike action.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Statutory provisions governing the holding of secret ballots before the calling of strikes or other industrial action were introduced by the Trade Union Act 1984 following the failure of most trade unions to adopt this practice voluntarily. These provisions have been in force since 26 September 1984 and are described fully in the Department's booklet "A guide to the Trade Union Act 1984". Moreover, the well publicised legal proceedings arising from the recent industrial action at Austin Rover will have left trade union leaders in no doubt about the potential consequences of failing to ballot their members before instructing them to strike.

Manpower Services Commission

41. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what have been the total wage costs of the Manpower Services Commission in each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Wage costs for the last three years were:

	£ million
1981-82	195·2
1982-83	207·3
1983-84	216·5

Wage costs include staff salaries, the employer's share of earnings-related national insurance and superannuation costs.

These wage costs represent 17·6, 15·5 and 12·3 per cent. respectively of the total Manpower Services Commission expenditure.

Homeworkers

43. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current average rates of pay for homeworkers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information from a survey carried out in 1981 suggests that median gross hourly earnings for people working at home were 180p an hour.

Youth Training Scheme and Further Education

44. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of school leavers joined the youth training scheme or entered some form of further or higher education during the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: About 29 per cent. of young people leaving school in Great Britain during the year ending August 1984 were expected to enter a full-time course of further or higher education. It is estimated that a further 38 per cent. have entered the youth training scheme.

Departmental Budget

45. Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action he is taking to secure better value for money from his Department's budget.

Mr. Tom King: I lose no opportunity to stress the importance I attach to securing the best possible value for money from available resources. My colleagues and I have this criteria in mind in all the decisions which we make about the Department's activities.

Reviews and scrutinies in the Department of Employment Group have made over 4,500 staff savings since 1979, including 1,350 following a study of the payment of benefits to unemployed people. The programme of scrutinies will continue.

Improvements in efficiency have contributed to a reduction in MSC permanent staff from 25,300 in April 1979 to 20,800 now, and further reductions will be made in the next few years particularly as a result of recently approved plans to improve the cost-effectiveness of the public employment service while increasing the number of jobcentres. The numbers of people trained under the Commission's adult training programmes will be doubled, within existing resources, by concentrating on more cost-effective and flexible forms of provision. The skillcentre training agency has operated as a trading account since April 1984 and is charged with covering all its costs from receipts. The professional and executive recruitment service also now operates on a self-financing basis.

I expect increased efficiency to yield significant savings of over 2,000 posts by 1988 following the planned installation of visual display units in unemployment benefit offices. There has already been a substantial improvement in the ratio of claimants to staff in the unemployment benefit service, from 85:1 in 1979-80 to 114:1 in 1983-84.

The top management review systems now operating in all parts of the Department of Employment group under the financial management initiative will be an important means of setting targets relevant to better value for money. The Manpower Services Commission has recently published an account of its top management review process in 1984, and I expect to issue a report this month which will describe the activities of the Department's senior management group in 1984.

Industrial Disputes

46. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many days were lost due to industrial disputes in 1984; and how many of those were due to the dispute in the coalmining industry.

52. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many days were lost due to industrial disputes in 1984, not counting days lost directly in connection with the present coal industry dispute.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is provisionally estimated that 26·6 million working days were lost through stoppages of work due to industrial disputes in 1984. Included in the total is an estimated total of 22·3 million working days lost due to disputes in the coal extraction industry, of which 21·9 million is due to the strike which began on 12 March 1984.

West Midlands

48. Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment which initiatives have been most successful in generating new employment in the west midlands.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are committed to maintaining their economic policies which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing, while encouraging greater enterprise flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. This is the only way to generate lasting jobs in the west midlands and elsewhere. Telford and the West Midlands metropolitan county have recently been designated intermediate areas to attract industry and investment, and thus improve job prospects. And we are encouraging the growth of employment through initiatives such as the enterprise allowance scheme which is currently helping some 4,500 people in the west midlands to set up their own businesses, and by establishing enterprise zones in Dudley and Telford.

Correspondence

49. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to reply to the letter he received from the hon. Member for Rother Valley dated 8 January, concerning the stopping of unemployment benefit to his constituents.

Mr. Alan Clark: I replied to the hon. Member on 31 January.

Leicester

51. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the unemployment rate for Leicester.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. and learned Member to my reply of 18 December 1984 at column 104.

Leisure, Tourist and Catering Industries

53. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the change in the level of employment in the leisure, tourist and catering industries since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates of the numbers of employees working in industries selected as being in large part related to leisure, tourism and catering are given in the following table. Many other industries (for example, transport, banking, and general retailing) also in part support leisure activities and tourism, but the proportion of an industry's employment which arises from supporting such activities cannot be identified from the Department's statistics.

Employees in employment in selected industries in Great Britain

EC Commissioners

54. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he next expects to meet the new European Economic Community Commissioner with responsibility for employment to discuss measures to reduce unemployment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend expects to meet Commissioners Pfeiffer and Sutherland at an informal meeting of Social Affairs Ministers on 8 February. At the meeting there will be a discussion on the creation of new employment opportunities resulting from the modernisation of industry and the introduction of new technology.

Trade Unions (Ballots)

57. Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many trade unions have indicated their intention to accept public money to conduct ballots of their members.

61. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Employment which unions have indicated their intention to use public funds to undertake ballots of their members.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am informed by the certification officer that at the latest available date 28 trade unions have applied for public money since the inception of the scheme. The 28 unions, including two which are affiliated to the TUC are:

Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers (Engineering, Foundry & Construction Section)
Assistant Masters & Mistresses Association
Association of Education Officers
Association of Managerial and Professional Staffs
Association of Optical Practitioners Ltd
Association of Public Service Finance Officers
Association of Public Service Professional Engineers
Barclays Group Staff Union
British Association of Occupational Therapists
British Medical Association
British Orthoptic Society
Chartered Society of Physiotherapy
Clearing Bank Union
Coventry Economic Building Society Staff Association
Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunication and Plumbing Union
Guinness Brewing Staff Association (UK)
Immigration Service Union
Institute of Journalists
Ministry of Defence Staff Association
National Association of Fire Officers
National Association of Head Teachers
National & Provincial Building Society Staff Association
Nat West Staff Association
Professional Association of Teachers
Retail Book, Stationery & Allied Trades Employees' Association
Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom
Society of Radiographers
The Society of Chiropodists

Reports in the press have suggested that a number of other TUC affiliated Unions are changing their attitude to accepting public funds for ballots. The British Airline Pilots Association has indicated that it will seek public funds for ballots and the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs and the United Road Transport Union are reported to be pressing the TUC to lift its boycott.

Factory Inspectors

58. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to increase the number of factory inspectors.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Decisions on the staffing of the factory inspectorate are a matter for the Health and Safety Executive, subject to the overall financial allocation and staff ceiling given to the Health and Safety Commission by the Government. The Executive plans to maintain the factory inspectorate at roughly its present strength in 1985. It is currently recruiting up to 30 general factory inspectors, in addition to the 25 recruited last year.

Health and Safety Executive

59. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to increase the field staff of the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Decisions on staff allocations to its field force are a matter for the Health and Safety Executive, subject to the overall financial allocation and staff ceiling given to the Health and Safety Commission by the Government. The executive hopes to maintain its field force at roughly the present level in 1985.

Job Creation

60. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any new initiatives to place before the European Economic Community Employment Ministers to reduce unemployment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend will be meeting colleagues from other member states later this week. He will be suggesting that in the social affairs field the Community should concentrate on proposals directly relevant to the task of job generation.

Manufacturing Industry (Apprenticeships)

62. Mr. Foster asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current number of apprenticeships in manufacturing industry; and what was the comparable figure in May 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The most recent estimate of the number of people employed as apprentices in manufacturing industries is 82,000 at March 1984, and the earliest comparable figure available is 124,000 at March 1982.

The numbers entering traditional apprenticeships will become increasingly irrelevant as a measure of the real level of skills training being undertaken by industry because of both the reform of existing training arrangements and the substantial provision of initial skills training now taking place under the youth training scheme.

Jobcentres

64. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the future size of the jobcentre network; and how many were in support of the Manpower Services Commission proposals.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission consulted some 4,000 organisations and individuals about its proposals for the jobcentre network. Replies were received from almost 3,000 of them.

There was substantial support for the expansion of the network through the addition of 82 new jobcentres and for plans to make better and more extensive use of new technology. Many of the responses expressed concern at the extent of the proposed centralisation and of the scale of the proposed staff reductions. The revised proposals approved by the Commission in December and subsequently endorsed by the Government contain changes to meet the views expressed during consultation, including a less extensive centralisation of services and a smaller manpower saving.

Job-splitting Scheme

66. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently taking advantage of the job-splitting scheme; and what are the comparable figures for each year since its inception.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the current financial year, 187 applications for support have been approved under the job splitting scheme up to the end of December, creating 374 part-time jobs. In 1982-83, from January when the scheme opened, 180 applications were approved creating 360 part-time jobs. In 1983-84, 656 applications were approved creating 1,312 part-time jobs.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

68. Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have entered the enterprise allowance scheme since it started.

Mr. Alan Clark: Up to the end of December 1984 just under 62,000 unemployed people had entered the enterprise allowance scheme since it was introduced nationally on 1 August 1983.

Minimum Rates of Pay

69. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce new measures to enforce legal minimum rates of pay.

71. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce new measures to enforce legal minimum rates of pay.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Current enforcement measures are considered to be adequate. In 1983, 6·3 per cent. of workers whose pay was checked were found to be underpaid.

72. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the average minimum rates of pay of people covered by wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Statutory minimum full time rates of pay for adults in the main negotiating grades of the seven largest wages councils range from around £63 to £72 per week.

Closed Shop

73. Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of employees estimated to be covered by closed shop agreements protected by law.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend for Buckingham (Mr. Walden).

Job Creation

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce new special employment measures specifically to cater for the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: All our employment and training measures, apart from those for young people, provide considerable help for long-term unemployed people. In particular, the community programme has now reached its target of providing 130,000 filled places. We continue to review how the employment and training measures might be improved further.

Manpower Boards

Mr. John Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of young people's representatives that have been co-opted to the area manpower boards since the beginning of the youth training scheme in April 1983.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Two, both of whom are still serving.

Benefit Applications

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases his Department has rejected for unemployment benefit on the basis of declared part-time employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: No claims to benefit have been rejected by my Department.

During 1983, the latest period for which information is available, 12,171 claims by people undertaking employment of fewer than six days a week were disallowed by the independent adjudicating authorities for the days on which they did not work because they were considered to be employed to their full normal extent (Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 7(1)(e).).

Notifiable Installations

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his assessment of the number of the United Kingdom's hazardous sites, of comparable potential danger to Union Carbide's factory at Bhopal, which will not be covered by the European Economic Community's Seveso directive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: All sites in the United Kingdom with a comparable potential danger to Union Carbide's factory at Bhopal will be covered by the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations, which implement the European Economic Community Seveso directive.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report, for the most recent available date, for each local authority area in Scotland, the number of notifiable installations constituting a major hazard.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of installations in each county notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substance Regulations 1982.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall reply to the hon. Members as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

Highway Corridors (London)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations he had with London boroughs and the Greater London council before letting the contracts for studies of new highway corridors in London.

Mrs. Chalker There are no such studies. Our assessment studies of traffic movement are looking at four existing corridors where there are great problems. They follow on from the proposals in our consultation documents sent to the GLC and all London boroughs in 1983 and 1984, and reflect their comments.

Traffic Signing

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the timetable for the experimental traffic signing campaign; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Experimental signs are usually specially authorised for a year in the first instance, further authorisation depending on their effectiveness. In general results have been satisfactory and some of the schemes have now been authorised on a permanent basis. Other experiments are still in progress.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of the current experimental traffic signing campaign.

Mrs. Chalker: Local highway authorities meet the cost of experimental signs. Information on costs is not available centrally.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the areas presently the subject of experimental traffic signing.

Mrs. Chalker: Zonal signing of entry and waiting restrictions have been authorised at the request of the local highway authorities in many parts of the country, including Chester, Nantwich, Shrewsbury, Kettering, Weston-super-Mare, Middleton, Newark, Swadlincote, Chesterfield, Alfreton, Lincoln, Retford and various sites in and around Nottingham. Special experiments are also taking place in several places in Cornwall, Cockington in Devon and at Leigh on Sea in Essex.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received concerning the experimental traffic signing campaign.

Mrs. Chalker: Experimental signs for pedestrian zones are being tried out in a number of towns, including Shrewsbury. They are designed to make signing less obtrusive in environmentally sensitive areas. Two representations have been received about the effects of the pedestrian zone in Shrewsbury which I have drawn to the attention of the local highway authority.

Channel Crossing

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the studies undertaken by his Department into the possible construction of a Channel road bridge and tunnel have arrived at any conclusions as to the side of the road on which motorists should drive; whether there will be a change-over half way across; and whether any common position on this issue has been arrived at with the French authorities.

Mr. David Mitchell [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 437]: No conclusions have been reached on this matter.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Marginal Land

Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the definition of dwindling population which is used for the purposes of defining marginal land.

Mrs. Fenner: EC directive 75/268 on the less favoured areas requires areas designated under article 3(4) to meet several criteria, one of which is that they must have a low or dwindling population. The European Commission has defined this as being a population density no greater than 50 per cent. of the national average, or no more than 75 persons per square kilometre. The latter test was applied in the United Kingdom's case to Brussels which resulted in the designation of our marginal land areas as less favoured.

Untreated Milk

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about sales of untreated milk.

Mr. Jopling: In March 1980 my predecessor announced that sales of untreated milk to outlets such as shops, schools, hotels and other catering establishments and institutions would no longer be permitted in England and Wales and Northern Ireland with effect from 1 May 1985. I remain committed to these additional restrictions and copies of proposals for the necessary amendment regulations are being issued today to interested parties for comment.

However, I recognise that the operation of the supplementary levy system and especially the lack of flexibility between wholesale and direct sales quota may pose problems for producers affected by the changes.

In view of this my right hon. Friends and I propose that the changes originally planned for 1 May 1985 should be postponed for six months to allow time for further negotiation in Brussels on quota flexibility and that existing licences should be extended by a similar period.

EC (Agricultural Production)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total European Economic Community agricultural production for cereals, milk, meat, sugar beet, wine and olive oil, respectively, in the first year of United Kingdom membership; and what has been the percentage change in production for each sector up to the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows. It should be noted that agricultural production fluctuates from year to year and a comparison between individual years is not necessarily a reliable indicator of the underlying trend in production. Wine production exhibits particularly marked seasonal fluctuations.

EC 10 Usable Production

	*1973-74 '000 tonnes	Percentage change 1973-74 to 1984-85 forecast*

Grants and Aid

Mr. Speller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list all forms of grant or other aid that are available through his Department to areas which do not qualify for assisted or intermediate status;

(2) if he will list all forms of grant or other aid available through his Department to areas that qualify for assisted or intermediate status.

Mrs. Fenner: The various types of aid which are available from my Department do not differ as between areas of assisted or intermediate status. There are, however, differences in the grants available to less favoured areas (as defined under EC Directive 75/268) compared with other areas.

Dutch Growers (Gas Prices)

Mr. Lyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response has been received from the European Commission to his representations that the European Commission should take all possible steps against the Dutch Government under article 93.2 of the treaty of Rome in relation to the granting of preferential gas prices to Dutch growers.

Mrs. Fenner: The European Commission has instituted proceedings under article 93(2) of the Treaty of Rome in relation to the preferential gas price to Dutch horticulturists. This article gives the Commission powers to abolish or alter a state aid within a specified period of time if, after receiving comments from the parties concerned, it considers that the aid is not compatible with the common market or is being misused. The Commission is now considering what action to take in the light of comments received.

Land Drainage

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultations he had with representative bodies from the land drainage industry or the National Farmers' Union before announcing the recent reductions in capital grant for land drainage.

Mrs. Fenner: The grant rate changes were made as a result of the latest public expenditure survey. Bearing in mind the confidential nature of this Survey, it was not appropriate to consult organisations outside Government about the options being considered under it.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Small Claims Courts

Dr. Godman asked the Attorney-General what has been the total number of cases heard in small claims courts in England and Wales for each of the last five years.

The Attorney-General: I assume that the hon. Gentleman is referring to cases which fall within the financial limit for the time being for small claims procedure in the county courts. I cannot give him precise figures, but the estimated numbers of such claims which were arbitrated in 1979-83 inclusive are shown in the following table.

Estimated number of money plaints for sums within the financial limit for the "small claims" procedure arbitrated in the years 1979 to 1983

	Numbers
1979	11,620
1980	11,530
1981	16,680
1982	21,470
1983	35,890

Notes:

(1) The financial limit for the small claims procedure was raised from £200 to £500 in April 1981.

(2) Figures in the table are estimates based on a two-month sample in each year.

(3) Figures are not yet available for 1984.

SCOTLAND

Skillcentres

78. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are being trained in skillcentres in Scotland; how many are sponsored; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: During December 1984, the latest date for which the information is available, 1,019 places were filled in skillcentres in Scotland, of which 41 were sponsored.

Outgoers Scheme

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received advocating that the outgoers scheme for dairy farmers should not be taxable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend has received such representations from one hon. Member and from one branch of the National Farmers Union of Scotland.

In deciding the terms of the scheme, the Government considered that it would not be appropriate to exempt payments from taxation. However, special arrangements were introduced to allow applicants to choose whether these payments should be treated as income or capital gains for tax purposes.

Blood Products

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if Scotland is already self-sufficient in blood products; for how long the heat treating of all concentrates has been taking place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Scotland is self-sufficient in all normally required blood products. All factor VIII concentrate issued from the protein fractionation centre of the Scottish national blood transfusion service since 1 January 1985 has been heat treated.

AIDS

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, in Scotland, all blood donors are required to sign a declaration that they are not in a high-risk group for acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Yes. The Scottish national blood transfusion service has issued a revised leaflet to donors setting out the groups which have a high risk of contracting AIDS and requesting donors in these groups not to give blood. Donors are required to sign a statement that they have read the leaflet and are not in one of the risk groups.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any evidence that blood from a patient in Scotland suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome has been used to make concentrated blood products which have subsequently been given to a number of haemophiliacs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: There is evidence that a batch of factor VIII produced in Scotland was made from a pool of plasma containing a contribution from an apparently healthy blood donor who must have been exposed to HTLV III, the virus which causes AIDS. This batch was used for the treatment of a number haemophiliacs, some of whom have developed antibodies to HTLV III. It does not follow that they have AIDS, nor that they will necessarily go on to get the disease. The batch was withdrawn from use on discovery of the evidence.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will be in a position to give details of the form which a super levy on dairy producers will take and as to whether quotas can be sold to other producers.

Mr. John MacKay: The arrangements for the payment of milk supplementary levy and for the transfer of quota are set out in Regulations EC Nos. 856/84, 857/84, 1371/84 and 1955/84 and in the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984 (SI 1984 No. 1047).

Liability for levy payment on wholesale deliveries arises only when deliveries to purchasers of milk (in Scotland the three Milk Marketing Boards and Freefield Dairy, Shetland) exceed the total of quotas issued to producers in their collection areas. Deliveries so far are within these totals and it remains to be seen whether any levy will be due at 31 March 1985. In the event of a purchaser quota being exceeded, the legislation provides that the liability for levy due should fall on those producers who have contributed to the excess by producing over their individual quotas. Producers who have direct sales quotas are liable to levy on an individual basis should they exceed their quotas.

The present Community legislation ties quota firmly to the land. A quota may not therefore be sold but may only be used by whoever occupies the land to which it is attached. The Government recognise the problems which the present arrangements may cause and have initiated consultations with interested parties to ascertain whether, and if so what, changes to Community rules need be sought.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many claims for secondary quotas have been submitted to tribunals; and how many have been reduced on the grounds that the present sales are unattainable because there is no evidence from historic yields to suggest that the present yield can be achieved.

Mr. John MacKay: The tribunal considered 1,394 claims for additional quota on grounds of investments made to increase milk production in the quota year 1984-85. After assessing all the information relating to historic performance, the tribunal judged that in 291 of these cases the claimed yield was unattainable.

Forestry (Grants)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of areas of land of 10 hectares or more in Caithness and Sutherland which have received approval for planting grants under the forestry grants scheme since that scheme began, giving the acreage in each case.

Mr. John MacKay: The information covering the period from 1 October 1981 to February 1985 is as follows:

Islands Councils (Inquiry)

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received on the report of the committee of inquiry into the functions and powers of the islands councils of Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has received representations from a total of 43 organisations and individuals in response to his invitation to submit views on the report of the Committee of Inquiry. The committee's recommendations have also generated other correspondence since its publication.

The recommendations, and the views received on them, are being considered, and we shall announce our conclusions as soon as possible.

Draft Deer (Firearms etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of the Draft Deer (Firearms etc.) (Scotland) Order 1984.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend expects to lay a draft Order before Parliament shortly.

Community Nursing Services

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money was spent in the last three years on the community nursing services in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 16]: The following table gives the amount of money spent on nursing staff and the overall expenditure on community health services in the last three financial years.

	1981-82	1982-83	£000 1983-84
Nursing staff expenditure	35,343	39,360	42,201
Community health services expenditure	84,227	93,941	101,293

West of Scotland Science Park

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to the answer of 30 January, Official Report, column 206-7, regarding the development of the west of Scotland science park, he will state the basis for the statement that the park has been operating for two years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 429]: My answer referred to the two-year period beginning in October 1982 when the science park began to operate, with the appointment of a development manager. Marketing began nearly a year before the opening of the first units in September 1983.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Departmental Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the total cost of administration of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Dr. Boyson: Figures are only available on a consistent basis from 1981-82. The figures given below are expressed in real terms at 1983-84 prices and cover both the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments:

	£ million
1981-82	350·4
1982-83	349·7
1983-84	360·0

Job Creation

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many of the new jobs created in Northern Ireland during 1984 were located in the Newry and Armagh constituency;

(2) how many of the new jobs created in the Newry and Armagh constituency during 1984 were (a) in the Armagh district council area and (b) in the Newry and South Mourne district council area;

(3) how many jobs were created in the Newry and Armagh constituency during 1984 by the Local Enterprise Development Unit;

(4) how many of the jobs created by the Local Enterprise Development Unit during 1984 were (a) in the Armagh district council area and (b) in the Newry and Mourne district council area;

(5) how many jobs were created in the Newry and Armagh constituency by the Industrial Development Board during 1984;

(6) how many of the jobs created by the Industrial Development Board during 1984 were (a) in the Armagh district council area and (b) in the Newry and Mourne district council area.

Dr. Boyson: The available information, which relates to job promotions, is as follows:

(a) Job promotions during 1984

	IDB	LEDU	Total
Northern Ireland	5,189	3,721	8,910
Newry and Armagh parliamentary constituency	282	296	578

(b) The 578 jobs promoted during 1984 in the Newry and Armagh parliamentary constituency were located in the following District Councils:

District Council	IDB	LEDU	Total
Armagh	24	89	113
Newry and Mourne	258	207	465

(c) The total number of job promotions in the Armagh and Newry & Mourne District council areas during 1984 were as follows:

District	IDB	LEDU	Total
Armagh	24	89	113
Newry and Mourne	316	283	599

Department of the Environment (Water Service)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what has been the cost to the Department of the Environment (Water Service) for (a) legal fees and (b) other costs concerned with contracts that have gone to arbitration since 1976;

(2) how many companies have been unable to fulfil contracts awarded by the Department of the Environment (Water Service) and have subsequently gone into voluntary liquidation since 1976;

(3) how many contracts awarded by the Department of the Environment (Water Service) since 1977 which are now complete (a) have final payments still not made to the contractor and (b) are the subject of arbitration;

(4) how many contracts awarded by the Department of the Environment (Water Service) since 1977 have been forwarded to arbitration and have been resolved; and what has been the cost to the Department on each contract over the agreed tender price.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Housing Executive

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what has been the cost to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive for (a) legal fees and (b) all other costs concerned with sending contracts to arbitration since 1976;

(2) how many companies have been unable to fulfil contracts awarded by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and have subsequently gone into voluntary liquidation since 1976;

(3) how many contracts awarded by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive since 1976 and now complete (a) have final payments still not paid to the contractor and (b) are subject to arbitration;

(4) how many contracts awarded by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive since 1976 have been through either arbitration or litigation and have been resolved; and what has been the extra cost to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive on each contract over the agreed tender price;

(5) in how many cases companies on the Northern Ireland Housing Executive list of companies suitable to tender have gone into voluntary liquidation and some or all of the directors have then formed another company which is now on the same list, since 1976.

Mr. Chris Patten: These are matters for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. However, I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available in the form requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applicants there were at the latest available date in Northern Ireland for Housing Executive accommodation in each council area; how many empty Housing Executive dwellings and units of accommodation there were in each area on the same date; how many of such dwellings or units of accommodation in each such area had been vacant for more than three months; and how many of the applicants have applied for accommodation in more than one council area.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 131]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available in the form requested. The information which is available is as follows:—

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Pensions

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make a statement on the position with regard to pension claims by British nationals who have served with the East African Land Forces Organisation;

(2) what is the total number of pension arrangements registered with Her Majesty's Government relating to service with the East African Land Forces Organisation.

Mr. Raison: It has recently been established that pensions deriving from service with the East African Land Forces Organisation (EALFO) by certain officers who transferred to public service in Kenya, Tanzania or Uganda after the organisation was disbanded in 1960 are eligible for inclusion in the British Government's pensions take-over programme. Four officers' pensions and 24 contingent widows' pensions are affected. The necessary arrangements are in train.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries with which Her Majesty's Government have an agreement to honour pre-independence pension arrangements.

Mr. Raison: Under the programme announced on 11 March 1970, at column 1344-49, Her Majesty's Government have entered into agreements with the following countries under which certain pension entitlements have been or are being taken over:

Antigua
Barbados
Belize
Botswana
Burma
Cyprus
Dominica
Fiji
Gambia
Ghana
Grenada
Guyana
Jamaica
Kenya
Kiribati
Lesotho
Malawi
Malaysia
Malta
Mauritius
Nigeria
St. Kitts
St. Lucia
St. Vincent
Seychelles
Sierra Leone
Singapore
Solomon Islands
Sri Lanka
Sudan
Swaziland
Tanzania
Uganda
Zambia

Afghanistan

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has yet received a copy of the report "The Threat of Famine in Afghanistan" financed by the Overseas Development Administration.

Mr. Raison: Yes.

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is prepared to make a grant of public money for humanitarian purposes inside Afghanistan to Afghan Aid in London on the same terms as he made a grant via the Afghanistan Support Committee in London to the Swedish Committee for a Free Afghanistan.

Mr. Raison: We have received a request from Afghan Aid for emergency relief to destitute Afghans and this is under active consideration.

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what conditions were attached to the grant of £50,000 made to the Afghanistan Support Committee in 1982; what arrangements were made to secure satisfactory accounting for these funds from the Swedish Committee for a Free Afghanistan, to which the funds were transferred on his instructions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The grant was to be used for the immediate purchase and supply of foodstuffs and medical supplies for humanitarian relief to Afghans through the auspices of Swedish Aid for Afghanistan. If at the end of three months from the date of issue, the contribution had not been used for the purpose set out above, the unspent balance would be refunded unless otherwise agreed with the Overseas Development Administration. The Afghanistan Support Committee was informed that the Overseas Development Administration would require a copy of the audited accounts of Swedish Aid for Afghanistan showing the Afghanistan Support Committee contribution as a clearly identified item. Such accounts have been received.

UNESCO

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what effect the proposed British withdrawal from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will have on the employment of British employees currently working for the organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: There is nothing in UNESCO's existing rules and regulations to suggest that the situation of individual staff members and the rights arising out of their contracts of employment are affected by the withdrawal of the member state of which they are citizens.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the financial implications of Britain's proposed withdrawal from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Raison: UNESCO's budget is calculated in dollars. The United Kingdom pays an assessed contribution of 4·61 per cent. of the total. At current rates of exchange the cost of our membership for 1985 will be about £7 million.

Should the United Kingdom withdraw from UNESCO at the end of 1985, no further subscriptions would be due.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the current amount spent by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation in Britain.

Mr. Raison: UNESCO make available this information on a two-yearly basis. In the two-year period 1982 and 1983 the estimated expenditure in the United Kingdom from the regular programme and extra budgetary sources was approximately $16·7 million.

CIVIL SERVICE

Contract and Procurement Procedures

Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister for the Civil Service when the Government will be announcing measures to implement the conclusions of the report by the Management and Personnel Office on Government contract and procurement procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Departments have the primary responsibility for implementing the recommendations in the report "Government Purchasing". All Departments have been asked to prepare action documents by 1 April and are doing so in consultation with the Management and Personnel Office. In addition, the Government have put in hand arrangements to identify suitable candidates for the post of head of the proposed central unit on purchasing.

Joint Management Unit

Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list the names, position, and relevant experience of the members of the Joint Management Unit.

Mr. Hayhoe: Head of the joint management unit is Mrs. Valerie Strachan. She entered the Civil Service in 1961 and has served in a number of Government Departments. In 1980 she was appointed a commissioner of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise (Under Secretary). In this capacity she has served as director of VAT Control, a large line management operation. More recently she was director of organisation which includes responsibility for the Department on finance and manpower and implementation of the financial management initiative in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

The deputy head of the joint management unit is Mr. William St. Clair (Assistant Secretary) who entered the Civil Service in 1960. He served with the Ministry of Defence and in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office before moving to Her Majesty's Treasury in 1970 where he has had experience of a wide range of subjects including public expenditure control and overseas finance. Most recently he was the head of a sizeable division dealing with superannuation arrangements in the public services.

Support to the Head and Deputy is provided by Mr. Michael O'Connor (Higher Executive Officer (Development)) who entered the Civil Service in 1982 and has served in the Department of Health and Social Security as a member of the Management Accounts Unit working on the implementation of the Financial Management Initiative.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many registered disabled people are currently employed by each Government Department; and in each case what percentage the number represents of the total number of employees.

Mr. Hayhoe: The numbers of registered disabled people employed by Government Departments are collected once a year, as at 1 June. The most recent figures, and the percentage of all employees who are registered disabled, are as follows:

Numbers and percentages of registered disabled people employed by Government departments (as at 1 June 1984)*

Questions (Cost)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Minister for the Civil Service what are his latest estimates of the cost of answering (a) an oral parliamentary question, (b) a priority written parliamentary question and (c) an ordinary written parliamentary question; and how these compare with the figures for (i) five years ago and (ii) 10 years ago, respectively.

Mr. Hayhoe: The costs of individual questions vary considerably, but the current average cost is estimated at £67 for oral answers and £41 for written answers. It is not possible from the information held centrally to distinguish between the costs of answering ordinary written and priority written questions.

In May 1980 the average cost for oral answers was estimated at £50 and for written answers at £30. In April 1975 the average cost for oral answers was estimated at £26 and for written answers at £16.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong (Civil Service Pensions)

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any proposals for ensuring stability in the value of the pensions earned by members of the Overseas Civil Service in Hong Kong when converted to sterling.

Mr. Luce: As I told my hon. Friend on 3 December, at column 26-27, we acknowledge that the resumption of sovereignty over Hong Kong by the People's Republic of China raises similar issues in respect of members of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service in Hong Kong as independence has in other dependent territories. Active consideration is being given to these issues.

Gothenburg Consulate

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has for the future of the consulate in Gothenburg, Sweden; and what representations he has received that it should remain open.

Mr. Renton: As part of the package of measures which my right hon. and learned Friend announced to the House on 22 November 1984 the British consulate in Gothenburg, Sweden is to be closed. Arrangements are in hand to appoint an honorary consul, who will be assisted by one locally engaged member of staff on a full-time basis.

We have received a number of representations that the consulate should remain open. These have come largely from the city authorities in Gothenburg and from Swedish business men.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the number of staff currently in post at the consulate in Gothenburg, Sweden; what was the total cost of this post in the 12-month period most readily identifiable; and what was the income received in fees or other charges.

Mr. Renton: The consulate currently has one United Kingdom-based officer and three locally-engaged employees (one part-time). The cost of the post in the 12 months ending 31 March 1984 was £46,146. Consular, passport and visa fees received in the same period totalled £574·18; postage and telex fees totalled £245·57.

Iraq (British Detainees)

Mr. Nelson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the prospects for the release of Mr. John Smith, currently serving a prison sentence in Iraq.

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the prospects for the release of Mr. Donald Hagger currently serving a prison sentence in Iraq.

Mr. Luce: We have raised these cases regularly with the Iraqi Government and they are fully aware of our deep concern. During my visit to Baghdad in November I repeated our appeals to Iraqi Ministers to release the two prisoners on humanitarian grounds. Unfortunately, we have received no assurance that either prisoner will be released in the near future. We shall, however, continue to take every opportunity to press for their release.

Hong Kong (Remanded Persons)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the length of time that each of the 12 women on remand in custody in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984 have been in prison;

(2) what is the length of time spent in prison by each of the three girls aged 14 to 20 years on remand in custody in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984; and what are their ages and the offence with which they are charged;

(3) how many (a) men, (b) women, (c) boys and (d) girls were on remand in custody in Hong Kong at the latest available date; and how many in each category have been in custody for (a) one to two months, (b) two to three months, (c) three to four months, (d) four to five months, (e) five to six months, (f) six to nine months, and (h) over one year, respectively;

(4) what are the ages, offences with which charged and the length of time in custody of each of the 59 14 to 20-year-old boys in custody on remand in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984;

(5) what were the ages, offences and sentences of each of the 348 14 to 20-year-old boys in prison in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984;

(6) if 14 to 20-year-old (a) girls and (b) boys in prison in Hong Kong are kept separate from adult prisoners;

(7) if he will list all the penal establishments in Hong Kong, indicating in each case the category, the number and type of prisoner it is designed for and the number it accommodates;

(8) what facilities exist in Hong Kong for mentally-disturbed offenders;

(9) what were the ages, offences and sentences of the nine 14 to 20-year-old girls in prison in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984;

(10) why a prisoner in Hong Kong has waited for 327 days to come to trial.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 311]: The information requested has now been compiled by the Government of Hong Kong, but in view of its length I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library.

DEFENCE

Arms Exports

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what safeguards exist to ensure that arms exports to non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation states are not subsequently used against the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butler: Each arms sale overseas requires an export licence. All applications for export licences are very carefully considered on a case by case basis. In order to ensure that it is, in every respect, in the national interest, a wide range of political, strategic, economic and security factors are taken into account before any licence is granted.

Greenham Common

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any British military personnel have been involved in an incident involving ionising radiation at Greenham common.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the nearest which unauthorised personnel have got to the silos at Greenham common.

Mr. Stanley: It would not be in the public interest to provide information that could enable the position of specific cruise missiles to be pinpointed. There have been isolated instances of unauthorised people reaching the fences around the main secure area.

Type 23 Frigates

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Defence which yards will be invited to tender for the third type 23 which he announced on 28 January, Official Report, column 21.

Mr. Lee: I have at present nothing to add to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 28 January, at column 21.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date his Department started to negotiate a tender for a new type 23 frigate with Swan Hunter.

Mr. Lee: No negotiations have yet taken place. As my right hon. Friend said on 28 January, at column 21, Swan

Hunter Shipbuilders Ltd. will be invited to tender for the type 23-O2 frigate as soon as this can sensibly be done and the order will be placed subject to satisfactory agreement on price and other contract terms.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence for which reasons he has decided to allocate the second order for the type 23 frigate to Swan Hunter without offering the order to open tender.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 28 January, at column 21.

Type 22 Frigates

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are penalty clauses in the two contracts for type 22 frigates awarded to Cammell Laird and Swan Hunter in respect of late delivery and of exceeding contract prices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Contracts for T22 frigates 13 and 14 were placed with Cammell Laird Shipbuilders and Swan Hunter Shipbuilders Ltd. respectively on 28 January 1985 at fixed prices and delivery dates. The contracts include liquidated damages clauses covering damages to be paid to MOD in respect of late delivery.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department obtained a no-strike guarantee from the Cammell Laird yard of British Shipbuilders before taking its decision to place an order for a type 22 frigate with that yard.

Mr. Lee: No. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has made clear, the deplorable and unnecessary industrial action which occurred last summer at Cammell Laird would, had it continued, have excluded the yard from further consideration in the competition.

Ship Construction Orders

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what circumstances he will in future use open tendering procedures for orders for naval ships; and in what circumstances he will personally allocate orders.

Mr. Lee: Orders will normally be placed as a result of competitive tendering. However, if there are special circumstances, these will be taken into account at the appropriate time.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement as to how far he takes regional considerations into account in the placing of orders for ships with British industry.

Mr. Lee: Orders will normally be placed on the basis of best price and delivery terms following competitive tendering. Other relevant factors will, however, be taken into account accoring to circumstances.

Hunt Class Mines Countermeasure Vessels

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to announce orders for two further Hunt class mines countermeasure vessels.

Mr. Lee: tenders have been received from Vosper Thornycroft (UK) Ltd. and Yarrow Shipbuilders Ltd. These are being considered. No decisions have yet been taken.

General Belgrano

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he intends to take following the public statements made by former Chief of the Defence Staff, Lord Lewin, on 29 June 1984 concerning the use of towed arrays in detecting the General Belgrano.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend does not consider that any response by himself to the public statements referred to is required at the present time in view of the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General to the hon. Gentleman on 1 February, at column 350.

Towed Sonar Array Systems

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Lord Lewin consulted his Department before giving details of towed sonar array systems in an interview published in The Guardian.

Mr. Stanley: I understand not.

Polaris

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the costs of the Chevaline improvement to the Polaris system.

Mr. Butler: The Ministry provided the Public Accounts Committee in 1981 (ninth report, 1981-82 Session) with an estimate for the Chevaline programme of about £1,000 million (including actual sunk costs and projected costs at September 1980 price levels). On a similar basis, but with projected costs at current prices, the estimate is now about £1·030 million.

Defence Costs

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Defence Estimates the cost of each major defence project.

Mr. Butler: It is already the practice to include in the annual "Statement on the Defence Estimates" a list of selected major projects which have started development during the preceding year, with estimated programme costs.

Departmental Staff (Outside Appointments)

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his Department's and armed services' staff have applied for positions in defence industries in the United Kingdom and the United States of America by year from 1979 to the present; how many were successful; and if he will list in the Official Report the organisations or industries to which they moved.

Mr. Butler: I shall answer shortly.

Medical Services (Privatisation)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to privatise part of the armed forces medical service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: While we are committed to maintaining three uniformed medical services, we are examining greater involvement of outside agencies in some medical areas, and indeed elsewhere in the MOD. It is too early to anticipate the outcome of this work.

Princess Alexandra Hospital, Wroughton

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many patients are in the Princess Alexandra hospital at Wroughton as a result of (a) industrial injury, (b) criminal injury and (c) psychiatric problems incurred in the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Lee: The number of patients at present in the Princes Alexandra hospital, RAF Wroughton, in the categories requested is as follows:

	Number
a) Industrial injury	6
b) Criminal injury	1
c) Psychiatric problems incurred in the Falkland Islands	Nil

Trident

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence within the total Trident costing,announced by him on 29 January, what percentage, and what actual sum of money has been set aside as the contingency reserve.

Mr. Butler: The overall provision for contingency is a little under 20 per cent. of the basic costs, or approximately £1·5 billion.

Defence Orders

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the in-service dates currently assumed for planning purposes for (a) EH101, (b) MCV80, (c) AST404, (d) the type 23 frigate and (e) AST412.

Mr. Butler: For reasons of security, it is not normal practice to publish detailed in-service dates. However, a broad indication of when these equipments will enter service is given below:

a. The EH101 will enter service in the early 1990s.

b. MCV80: the first unit will be equipped well before the end of the decade.

c. AST404: Decisions have yet to be taken on a replacement light support helicopter.

d. Type 23 Frigate: HMS Norfolk, the first of class, is planned to be accepted from the shipbuilders early in 1989.

e. AST412: It is expected that, if a new aircraft is ordered in preference to refurbishing the Jet Provost, it will be in service with the Royal Air Force before the end of the present decade.

Cash Limits

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made in current defence cash limits for 1984-85.

Mr. Heseltine: There are the following changes which are subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary spring Supplementary Estimates. None of the changes adds to the planning total of public expenditure.

£000s

Class I	Current cash limit	Increase/decrease		Revised cash limit
I, 1	6,367,775	−12,697	reduced provision	6,344,258
		−9,364	transferred to I, 3
		−1,000	transferred to XII, 1
		−360	transferred to XII, 2
		−46	transferred to Northern Ireland X, 2
		−150	transferred to IX, 3
		+100	provision within agreed Defence Public Expenditure Programme 1 hitherto unallocated to Votes
I, 2	8,329,907	−300	reduced provision	8,329,607
I, 5	460,372	−10,000	transferred to XIV, 2	450,372

The £12,997,000 reduced provision reflects surrender of VAT refunds on services contracted-out before 1 September 1983 and of excess provision following lower than anticipated take-up of the armed forces youth training scheme.

Other changes are in respect of transfers to other Departments' Votes towards improved age allowances for war widows—18 June 1984, column 21—changes in benefit disregard for unemployed UDR members and territorial reservists—column 415—the costs of British representation at the hearings of the Australian Royal Commission on British nuclear tests; increased expenditure, borne on XIV, 2, on consultants' fees for design of defence works projects; and in respect of increased expenditure on Defence Vote, Class I, 3, retired pay and pensions.

Service Personnel (Drugs)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish figures of the numbers of service personnel convicted of offences connected with drugs for each year since 1980, by service, rank and type of drug concerned.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 159]: The number of British armed forces personnel convicted in military and civilian proceedings on drug-related offences in the years in question is as follows:

	Royal Navy/ Royal Marines	Army	RAF
1980	100	39	14
1981	100	70	32
1982	36	69	17
1983	61	114	15
1984 (to 30 September)	32	118	109

Details of types of drugs involved in the above cases are not available; however, more than 90 per cent. of the RAF's and some 80 per cent. of the Navy's convictions were for offences involving cannibis only. A detailed breakdown of ranks is not available as such statistics are not kept; however, only one officer (Army 1982) has been convicted during the period.

Notes:

1. The Royal Navy's figures are not directly comparable to those of the other two services because:
   (a) they do not include convictions in civilian courts for which records are not readily available, and
   (b) the Royal Navy's policy is to try almost all drugs cases whilst the other two services have tended to deal with very minor cases administratively.
2. The RAF figure for 1984 reflects the fact that from the beginning of that year all minor offences have been subject to formal disciplinary action rather than being dealt with administratively as previously.
3. All Royal Navy figures and RAF figures for 1984 include convictions for minor drug-related offences charged respectively under section 39 of the Naval Discipline Act or section 69 of the Air Force Act. The Army does not produce a breakdown of offences charged under section 69 of the Army Act which is used for a wide variety of misdemeanours, and no section 69 offences are therefore included in the Army's figures.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teaching Hours (Universities)

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what statistics are held by his Department pertaining to the average number of hours per annum spent on teaching by those responsible for this duty in universities.

Mr. Brooke: None.

Impaired Hearing (Microcomputers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what provisions he intends to make for promoting the use of microcomputers in educating pupils with learning impediments.

Mr. Dunn: The Government have made provision for the promotion of microlectronics in special education within the microelectronics education programme (MEP). Four regional centres (SEMERCs) have been established, at Newcastle upon Tyne, Manchester, Bristol and Redbridge. The programme began in 1981 and has been extended to March 1986; further development beyond that time is at present under discussion.

The MEP has produced a number of programmes for children with learning difficulties. The Government are also making available, through MEP, free software packs for use by children with special educational needs. These packs were developed initally by the Scottish Council for Educational Technology.

Under the education support grants programme for 1985-86, £2·25 million has been allotted to local education authorities for the provision of microelectronic equipment designed or adapted for pupils with special educational needs.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make resources available to enable primary and secondary school teachers to instruct pupil groups of smaller numbers.

Mr. Dunn: Average sizes of classes as taught in primary and secondary schools in England have been reducing steadily in recent years. The Government's expenditure plans should permit nationally a continuing modest improvement in pupil to teacher ratios provided the cost of employing staff can be contained. It is, however, for local education authorities to assess, in the light of their own circumstances, what priority should now be given to further reductions in class sizes and to time for teachers to develop and plan the curriculum, to undertake further training, and to assess and review the progress of their pupils.

Local Education Authorities (Property Sales)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of school sites and quantities of acreage which have been sold off by local education authorities to private entrepreneurs in each single year since 1982 and the amount received in each case.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected by the Department.

Academic Tenure

Mrs Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his response to the University Grants Committee's memorandum on academic tenure.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend is considering the University Grants Committee's memorandum on academic tenure. He has published it to encourage debate and has, in particular, sought the views of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals and the Association of University Teachers.

Natural Environment Research Council (Chairman)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he plans to appoint a successor to Mr. Hugh Fish as chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) on 4 February at column 390.

Haemophiliacs

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what Medical Research Council funds are devoted to research into the problems of haemophiliacs at the Royal Free hospital in London; what is his estimate for spending in 1985-86 at the Royal Free hospital unit; and if he will make a statement on general expenditure on research to help haemophiliacs.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the Medical Research Council's expenditure on research projects relevant to the problems of haemophiliacs amounted to £50,000 in the 1983-84 financial year, but that the council is not currently funding any work on this subject at the Royal Free hospital.

Work on the important problem of haemophilia is part of the council's total research effort in the field of blood and blood disorders, to which field the council contributed funds totalling £1·94 million in 1983-84. Research relevant to haemophilia may also be carried out in universities and medical schools using funds allocated for teaching and research on the advice of the University Grants Committee.

Meniere's Disease and Tinnitus

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the level of funding at the university of Keele and other research centres for research to combat Meniere's disease and tinnitus.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. It is for the council to decide on the distribution of the resources available to it between research in the various areas of medical science. I understand that the MRC is providing grant support to the department of communication and neuroscience at the university of Keele and to other centres for research into Meniere's disease and tinnitus. The MRC is always ready to consider soundly based research proposals for support through its grants schemes in competition with other applications.

Research work relevant to Meniere's disease and tinnitus is also being conducted in universities and medical schools. It is likely that such work is financed in part from the block grant to universities allocated for teaching and research on advice from the University Grants Committee.

Children (Special Educational Needs)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether he will list the information and statistics relating to the education of children with special educational needs (a) of statutory school age and (b) between the ages of 16 and 19 years which is known to be collected by local education authorities but is not collated centrally by his Department;

(2) whether he will list the information and statistics relating to pre-school educational provision, including pre-school playgroups, which is known to be collected by local education authorities but is not collated centrally by his Department.

Mr. Dunn: The collection of information other than that required by the Department is a matter for individual local education authorities, and the Department has no information about the practices which they adopt.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what statistics relating to the education of children now designated as having special educational needs his Department has ceased collecting since the introduction of the Education Act 1981.

Mr. Dunn: The Department no longer requires these statistics to be analysed into the 10 statutory categories of handicap which applied before the Education Act 1981 came into force. Information previously collected from local education authorities about children with special educational needs educated under arrangements made by authorities under section 56 of the Education Act 1944 has now been replaced by the collection of data relating to arrangements made in accordance with section 3 of the 1981 Act. The Department has also ceased to collect details of children boarded in homes. Additionally, the Department no longer asks for information about children over the age of five for whom no education is being provided on the day that the return is made.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the integration of children with special educational needs since the Education Act 1981 in relation to the figures given as projections of the school population in the "Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 and 1987-88", volume II, table 3.10.3.

Mr. Dunn: The projected number of pupils in special schools set out in table 3.10.3 of the "Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 and 1987-88" assumes that a constant proportion of pupils with special educational needs will continue to be educated in special schools over the next three years. The drop in numbers between 1982-83 and 1983-84 represents a transitional year and is not regarded as a good indicator of future trends.

Teachers (GCSE)

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to help teachers in secondary schools and colleges to prepare for the introduction of the General Certificate of Secondary Education.

Sir Keith Joseph: I wrote on 21 December 1984 to the chairman of the Secondary Examinations Council, Sir Wilfred Cockcroft, setting out proposals for a special programme of in-service support and training for teachers of General Certificate of Secondary Education examination courses. The aim is to give teachers as much help as possible in preparation for the introduction of the new examination.

The programme will concentrate on the national criteria, subject by subject, techniques of differentiated assessment, and the setting and assessment of course work, practical and oral work. It will require close co-operation between all the partners concerned — the examining groups, the Secondary Examinations Council, local education authorities and schools and colleges.

The intention is that the examining groups should conduct seminars of two or two and a half days for subject representatives nominated by local education authorities, schools and colleges, and that these subject representatives should then conduct similar seminars for all other teachers of GCSE courses. I see these seminars as the first step in a continuing programme of in-service support for GCSE teachers. To ensure that they derive maximum benefit from the seminars, the Secondary Examinations Council will arrange, in collaboration with the examining groups, for the preparation of GCSE teacher manuals, subject by subject, and of videos where appropriate. The manuals and videos will be available to all teachers of GCSE courses and will be designed to be of continuing value to teachers as works of reference when teaching GCSE courses.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I propose, subject to the approval of Parliament, to make an additional grant to the Secondary Examinations Council of £675,000 in 1985-86 and £185,000 in 1986-87. This will enable the council to co-ordinate the preparation and dissemination of the GCSE teacher manuals and videos and to make a substantial contribution towards the costs of the examining groups in providing the seminars for subject representatives. I also propose, again subject to the approval of Parliament, to extend the in-service teacher training grants scheme to support expenditure of £6 million on the cost to LEAs of sending subject representatives from schools and colleges to attend the seminars provided by the examining groups.

Copies of my letter to Sir Wilfred Cockcroft have been placed in the Library.

Inner London Education Authority (Staff)

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what statistical information and controls are available to him as to the total number of staff employed in the Inner London education authority; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: Information is collected annually from all LEAs as to the numbers of teachers, and quarterly through the Joint Manpower Watch from all local authorities—including the ILEA separately—as to total full-time and part-time employees. The ILEA also publish in its annual capital and revenue estimates details of the number of posts in the authority.

As to controls, the new ILEA would fall within the scope of the provisions of clause 80 of the Local Government Bill. These are intended to give Ministers the necessary powers to forestall any expansion in bureaucracy, and to ensure that services are efficiently and effectively provided, when the new authorities proposed in the Bill come into being. They are essentially a transitional measure, intended to promote the efficiency of the new structures when they are established. In the case of the ILEA, however, an administrative structure is already in existence; and the authority will not be facing the prospect of rate limitation for the first time. In the circumstances, therefore, the Government would not at present propose to apply the controls to the new ILEA. It should be clearly understood, however, that if there are indications that decisions taken by the ILEA will have implications for manpower that are not in accordance with the objectives of economy, efficiency and effectiveness, regulations under clause 80 will be made. The content of any such regulations would depend on the circumstances they were intended to meet.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Privatisation

Mr. Merchant asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the levels of balance sheet debt at the date of sale or last year end of those public sector enterprises of which the Government prior to sale owned 51 per cent. or more and after sale owned less than 50 per cent.

Mr. Moore: Balance sheet debt in the form of medium and long-term group liabilities was as shown in the following table:

Sale	Date of sale	Capital debt £ million*	Capital debt at*
British Aerospace	February 1981	35·5	14 June 1980
Cable and Wireless	†October 1981	20·7	31 March 1981
National Freight Company	February 1982	1·0	13 June 1981
Amersham International	February 1982	‡10·5	30 September 1981
Britoil	November 1982	‖256·1	1 August 1982
Associated British Ports Holdings	February 1983	82·0	30 June 1982
Enterprise Oil	June 1984	Nil	31 December 1983
British Telecom	November 1984	¶3,251	31 March 1984

* Medium and long-term group liabilities.

† After the October 1981 sale, the Government's residual shareholding remained marginally above 50 per cent. It was reduced to 23·1 per cent. in December 1983.

‡ Includes lease finance of £1·7 million.

‖ Includes a debenture of £80·2 million issued to BNOC as part consideration for transfer of business.

¶ Includes lease finance of £148 million.

Trident

Mr. O'Neill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will include in his commentary on defence public expenditure programmes in the public expenditure White Paper an indication of the impact of the cost of the Trident project at the date of publication of the White Paper on the future composition of the remainder of the defence budget.

Mr. Butler: I have been asked to reply.

Pursuant to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on 21 January, at column 321, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced on 29 January, at columns 134-37, his revised cost estimate for the Trident programme. This will represent on average about 3 per cent of the defence budget over the period of its procurement.

Government Expenditure

79. Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what studies he has conducted into the relative labour intensity of different forms of Government expenditure.

Mr. Peter Rees: Detailed information on the labour intensity of government spending is not readily available. The 1985 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) contains information on the composition of public expenditure, including the proportion expected on present plans to go directly in pay. Input-output tables for 1979, prepared by the Central Statistical Office may be used to obtain information on the average labour intensity of different categories of expenditure, and output in different industrial sectors.

Exchange Rates

80. Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the likely change in the level of unemployment caused by recent falls in the value of the pound sterling on the exchange rates.

Mr. Peter Rees: There is no presumption that the recent falls in the value of the pound sterling will increase unemployment at all.

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the percentage increase in (a) the European Economic Community own resources base and (b) the European Economic Community income from own resources in the latest three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The figures for changes in the European Economic Community own resources base, reflecting actual payments for duties and levies and VAT as estimated for Budgets, together with the figures for Own Resources income received in the latest three available years are given below. The definition of Own Resources used is that in the Own Resources Decision.

	1981 Per cent.	1982 Per cent.	1983 Per cent.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Holt asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new firms registered to pay value added tax in Cleveland in each of the past five years; and how many of these firms have survived for two years or more.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that records are not maintained in this form. Only the total number of new registrations for VAT is centrally recorded, no distinction being made between new and existing firms who register. Also, the statistics of persons deregistering from VAT makes no distinction between firms going out of business and those deregistering for other reasons. The available information, for the past five years, for those traders whose local VAT office is situated in Cleveland, is as follows:

	New registrations	Deregistrations
1980	1,986	1,801
1981	1,666	1,304
1982	1,965	1,780
1983	2,122	1,792
1984	2,029	1,748

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Her Majesty's Government propose to comply with the draft 18th Council directive of the Commission of the European Communities, document, reference COM(84) 649 final, of 30 November 1984, in respect of requiring Britain to impose value added tax by 1 January 1986 on (a) supplies linked to sport or physical education made by non-profit-making organisations, (b) cultural supplies made by bodies governed by public law, (c) supply of transport by ambulance for sick or injured persons, (d) supplies by intermediaries relating to transactions in transferable securities and (e) management of investment funds, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: This draft directive has yet to be discussed in the Council of Ministers and unanimous agreement would be required for it or any amended version to be adopted. In its present form it would not have the effect of requiring the items mentioned to be taxed. Under the sixth VAT directive they are exempt but there is a derogation allowing member states to continue to tax them as a transitional measure. The new proposals would end that derogation. An explanatory memorandum on the draft directive will shortly be deposited in the Library in the normal way.

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the proposal in the draft 18th Council directive of the Commission of the European Communities, document reference COM(84) 649 final, of 30 November 1984, whereby the European Economic Community will require Britain to impose value added tax by 1 January 1988 on (a) supplies by undertakers and cremation services, (b) transactions carried out by hospitals and (c) passenger transport.

Mr. Hayhoe: This draft directive does not contain proposals to apply value added tax to these items. An explanatory memorandum will shortly be deposited in the Library in the normal way.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take the necessary steps to ensure the zero rating of value added tax for the supply to eligible bodies of computer systems, purchased with funds provided by a charity or from voluntary donations, and used in medical research, treatment or diagnosis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have nothing to add to what I told the hon. Member in my letter to him of 21 January.

Civil Service Pensions

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average weekly Civil Service pension; and what percentage of Civil Service pensioners are on or below this average.

Mr. Hayhoe: The average pension in payment to retired civil servants is just under £48 a week. It is not possible to calculate from the available statistics what percentage of retired civil servants are on or below this average. However, taking retired civil servants together with the dependants of ex-civil servants the average weekly pension is £41. Some two-thirds of Civil Service pensioners on that definition are on or below this average.

Taxation

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his current estimate of the loss of tax revenue if the investment income of husband and wife were taxed independently;

(2) by how much the abolition of the investment income surcharge has reduced the cost of taxing the investment income of husband and wife independently.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his replies, 21 January 1985, c. 319]: On the basis of the recorded distribution of investment income between husband and wife, the latest estimate of the overall cost in 1984-85 of the income election described in paragraphs 46 to 50 of the Green Paper "The Taxation of Husband and Wife" (Cmnd. 8093) is about £320 million. If the investment income surcharge had been retained the cost would have been about £50 million greater.

The estimates do not reflect the possible rearrangement of income between husband and wife which might occur in response to the change.

Capital Transfer Tax

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cost to the Exchequer since 1980-81 of the alteration in the rates of capital transfer tax.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c. 314]: If capital transfer tax had been charged at 1980-81 rates, indexed after 1982-83 in accordance with the provisions of the Finance Act 1982, it is estimated that receipts in subsequent years would have been greater by the following amounts:

	£ million
1981-82	2
1982-83	40
1983-84	60
1984-85	50

No allowance has been made for the possibility that the difference in tax rates would have affected the amounts chargeable.

Value Added Tax (Publications)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he has made of the implications of the imposition of value added tax on the level of purchases of books and other publjcations by students.

Mr. Hayhoe: [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 391]: I have been asked to reply.

These implications are among the many factors that would need careful consideration if books and other publications were to the be brought into tax.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he has made of the implications of the imposition of value added tax on books and other publications on (a) public library usage and (b) book provision.

Mr. Hayhoe: [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 390-91]: I have been asked to reply.

On part (a) I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) on 25 October 1984 at column 658.

On part (b) of the question, representations have been made by trade and educational interests and are being carefully considered.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Regional Health Authorities

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which regional health authorities have now indicated that they will be unable to comply with the timetable for drafting their outline regional policy report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All regions have now drafted their outline strategies as a first step to preparation of their regional strategic plans. The following dates have been agreed for submission of completed plans to our Department and, as far as we are aware, all regions are intending to meet their dates.

Northern—31 May
Yorkshire—30 June
Trent—6 April
East Anglian—31 March
North West Thames—30 June
North East Thames—Already submitted; cleared at June 1984 Ministerial Regional Review
South East Thames—31 May South West Thames—30 June
Wessex—31 March
Oxford—Already submitted; cleared at December 1984 Ministerial Regional Review
South Western—31 March

North Western—31 March

Homeless Persons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single homeless people are on Merseyside; what are the numbers of (a) reception centres, (b) resettlement units, (c) hostels, (d) lodging houses and (e) hotels and so on, catering for them on a temporary basis; how many beds are in each; and how many individuals by sex there are in each facility, in each case, for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: No figures are available to show how many single homeless people there are on Merseyside. There is one resettlement unit (formerly a reception centre) which has 57 beds for men but none for women. The average occupancy level during the 12 months ended 20 November 1984 was 48 (84·2 per cent.). Such information is not available in respect of the other types of accommodation specified.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single homeless persons by sex were received into the Fazakerley reception centre and resettlement unit in the last year for which figures are available; how many of these fell within priority need, as defined in section 2 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977; how many of the latter were rehoused by local housing authorities, listing the housing authorities and the number each housed; and if any Merseyside local housing authorities refused to take single homeless persons from the centre unit.

Mr. Whitney: 843 men but no women were admitted to the Fazakerley resettlement unit (formerly a reception centre) during the period 12 months ended 20 November 1984. There are no figures available to show how many of these fell within priority need as defined by section 2 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. Nor are there figures available to show how many people in this category were rehoused by local housing authorities.

We are not aware that any single homeless men referred from the unit have been refused accommodation by the local housing authority.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of those currently living in reception centres are entitled to immediate housing from local authorities; how many are men and how many are women; and what instructions are given to hostel staff concerning assistance with rehousing.

Mr. Whitney: There are no figures available which show how many people living in resettlement units (formerly reception centres) are entitled to immediate housing from local authorities. Staff in these units are instructed to give all possible help to residents to find suitable accommodation and this includes liaising with local authorities to provide rented accommodation in appropriate circumstances.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of those in employment now receive family income supplement: and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Whitney: Of the total number of those in employment at September 1979 and September 1984, the number in receipt of family income supplement (FIS) at those dates represent 0·3 per cent. and 0·8 per cent. respectively.

It should be noted that the numbers in employment include categories who would not be eligible for FIS, for example part-time workers and people without children. The numbers in these categories are not separately available. The numbers of those in employment also include separately husbands and wives where both are working, whereas the couple represent a single family unit for FIS purposes.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received about the effect on the availability of analgesics under the National Health Service of the proposed limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received a number of comments about the analgesics to remain available on National Health Service prescription under our limited list proposals. We are carefully considering these comments.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a detailed report or summary of the responses against his proposal for a limited list: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 4 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) at column 448.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he plans to give to doctors in completing prescription forms so that they may take account of the psychological attachment to the shape and colour of particular medicines that may be withheld from the National Health Service list of approved drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am confident that doctors are well able to overcome any difficulties which might arise from changing the shape and colour of patients' drugs without any special advice from our Department.

Heat-treated Factor IX

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will bring forward proposals to ensure that the heat-treated factor IX is made freely available on the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No product licences have been issued for heat-treated Factor IX. The Blood Products Laboratory is developing such a product, but it has not yet reached a stage where it is ready for clinical trials. Commercially-produced, unlicensed heat-treated Factor IX is however available and can be prescribed by clinicians on a 'named patient' basis.

AIDS

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received any evidence which suggests that the acquired immune deficiency syndrome virus HTLV-III may be transmissible through saliva; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There is limited scientific evidence to show that the AIDS associated virus (HTLVIII) can be transmitted in saliva. However, epidemiological evidence indicates that AIDS is usually transmitted through sexual contact (predominantly homosexual intercourse), sharing unclean intravenous needles or through transfusion of AIDS infected blood or blood products.

Benefits

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of all benefits paid to the unemployed in the United Kingdom in the years 1974-75 to 1983-84 (i) excluding men over 60 years not required to sign on and (ii) including such men.

Mr. Whitney: Estimates of the cost of benefits paid to the unemployed (unemployment benefit, supplementary benefit and housing benefit) in the United Kingdom are shown in the table. These figures include estimated amounts for rent and rate rebates paid under the scheme operating prior to the introduction of housing benefit 1983.

£ million

Year	Cost of benefits to the unemployed not required to sign on
	Excluding men over 60	Including men over 60
1974-75	470
1975-76	910
1976-77	1,230
1977-78	1,470
1978-79	1,450
1979-80	1,540
1980-81	2,640
1981-82	4,210	4,260
1982-83	5,270	5,380
1983-84	5,950	6,290

Part-time Work

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes he has introduced, or plans to introduce, arising from the proposals of the European Community Commission to the Council of Ministers concerning part-time work, as outlined in Council document 4138/83, published on 11 January 1983; and if he will make a statement about the implications for social security structures.

Mr. Whitney: The amended proposals of the European Community Commission to the Council of Ministers concerning part-time work to which the hon. Member refers have not yet been adopted by the Council. We have no plans, therefore, to make any social security changes at present to carry out what has been proposed.

The implications of the proposals are set out in the explanatory memoranda dated 3 February 1982, 29 November 1982 and 1 February 1983 presented to Parliament and relating to the Council document 4138/83 and to the earlier document 4053/82 which contained the Commission's original proposals.

Heating Allowances

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to introduce a weekly £7 heating allowance to all pensioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: No. It would cost about £3 billion to give a weekly £7 heating allowance to all pensioners regardless of need. The best way to use the available resources is to concentrate on helping those most in need by maintaining or increasing so far as possible the value of supplementary benefit rates. Between November 1978 and November 1984 the real value of the main rates of supplementary benefit increased by about 6 per cent. and over the same period the basic rate of heating addition increased by about 147 per cent. compared with an increase in fuel prices of about 108 per cent. We expect to spend some £400 million on heating additions this financial year, which is about £140 million more in real terms than was spent in 1978-79. More than 90 per cent. of supplementary pensioners now have a heating addition, as well as getting the higher long-term rate of supplementary benefit which is worth £7·65 a week more for a single householder and £11·55 more for a couple than the ordinary rate.

Blood Products

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue regulations to require that anyone administering blood products should wear surgical gloves; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The precautions to be taken are a matter for the doctor responsible for individual patients.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) to what extent non-heat-treated blood products are still being used in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement;

(2) by which date British heat-treated factor VIII, free of acquired immune deficiency syndrome virus, will become available from the national blood products laboratory in Elstree; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he is satisfied that the output of heat-treated blood products from the national blood products laboratory in Elstree is sufficient to meet domestic demand; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information on the use of blood products is not available centrally. Heat-treatment can be applied only to certain blood products, of which factor VIII is one of the most important. At present the blood products laboratory, Elstree manufactures almost half of the National Health Service consumption of factor VIII. BPL has started to heat treat its factor VIII, and limited amounts will be distributed to the National Health Service for clinical trials within the next two weeks. Heat-treatment capacity is being increased, and it is hoped that, by April this year, all BPL factor VIII will be heat-treated.

The major redevelopment of BPL is on schedule to open in January 1986. This is intended to provide the capacity to meet the forecast demand on the National Health Service in England and Wales for factor VIII. The heat-treatment process however reduces product yield and the consequences of this for the timetable for achieving self-sufficiency in factor VIII is being examined.

Invalid Care Allowance

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the annual cost of extending the invalid care allowance to include married women.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) on 17 January at column 224.

Blindness Allowance

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the annual cost of introducing a blind allowance for all registered blind persons at the same rate as the non-contributory invalidity allowance.

Mr. Newton: The cost of a blindness allowance at the same rate as non-contributory invalidity pension—now severe disablement allowance—is estimated to be £140 million a year.

Well Women Clinics

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish his Department's evaluation of the well women centre at Wythenshawe clinic;

(2) what is his policy on the development of well women clinics and centres;

(3) if he will list for each regional health authority area the number and location of well women clinics set up by health authorities or operating on National Health Service premises;

(4) what evaluation has been conducted by his Department on the role of well women clinics and centres;

(5) if he will issue national guidelines to all health authorities on the establishment and organisation of well women centres to provide a comprehensive medical screening and counselling service for women.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the number and location of well women clinics is not held centrally and no evaluation of the role of such facilities, or of specific clinics, has been carried out by the Department. The prevention of ill health and promotion of good health are among the Government's prime objectives and we take every opportunity to encourage the National Health Service to develop these aspects of its services. However, the provision of special facilities such as well women clinics is a matter for individual health authorities to decide in the light of local needs and priorities.

Rainhill Hospital

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of Rainhill hospital.

Mr. John Patten: The Mersey regional health authority is preparing costings and timetables for the closure of Rainhill hospital in the 1990s. This is in line with the region's strategy to devolve services for the mentally ill from large institutions to provide a more local, district based, service.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of hospital beds in Rainhill hospital in each of the past six years to the latest date

Mr. John Patten: The information is given in the table:

Average daily number of available beds in Rainhill Hospital

Year	Number
1978	1,768
1979	1,550
1980	1,440
1981	1,439
1982	1,440
1983	1,367

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current cost of maintaining patients transferring from Rainhill mental hospital to private hostels in North Wales.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally. Mersey regional health authority's general policy in respect of financing transfers from hospital to community settings is to arrange an individual payment in respect of each patient or group of patients depending on the cost of alternative care. Costs vary according to whether the transfer is to local authority, voluntary or private sector provision and is affected by such factors as eligibility for social security benefits.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many patients discharged from Rainhill hospital are now resident in hostels in north Wales at the latest date;

(2) how many patients and ex-patients from Rainhill hospital have been transferred to private hostels in north Wales in each of the past three years to the latest date.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect detailed information centrally. The hon. Member may care to write to the chairman of St. Helens and Knowsley health authority for the information.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of staff employed at Rainhill hospital in each of the past six years.

Mr. John Patten: Information cannot be provided in the form requested except at disproportionate cost. The readily available information is given in the table.

Numbers of certain categories of staff (whole time equivalents) employed at Rainhill Hospital at 30 September

Year	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why patients from Rainhill mental hospital have been discharged to private hostels in north Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: It is national policy to transfer patients from large mental illness institutions to community settings where this is in the interests of the patients concerned. The Rainhill patients transferred to north Wales are all patients who have no relatives or other links with Merseyside or who are known never to receive visitors. Placements are made only after careful multi-disciplinary assessment of the most suitable alternative accommodation.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if ex-patients of Rainhill hospital are given any choice of establishment when being sent to hostels in north Wales.

Mr. John Patten: Patients are transferred to the community only after individual multi-disciplinary assessment, which takes account of the patient's views. Liverpool social services department which arranged the placements in question have interviewed all the ex-patients, none of whom has expressed any desire to return to Merseyside.

Mental Patients

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the criteria for private hostels being accepted by his Department for receiving ex-mental hospital patients;

(2) if patients in mental hospitals or their families are consulted about transfers from hospitals to private homes.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current estimated weekly cost of maintaining a patient in a mental hospital.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest available figures are those derived from health authorities' costing returns for 1983-84, and are £232·26 for a patient in a mental illness hospital and £205·59 for a patient in a mental handicap hospital.

Abortions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many abortions have been performed in the United Kingdom since the enactment of the Abortion Act 1967.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of abortions performed under the Abortion Act 1967 in Great Britain from 27 April 1968 to 31 December 1983 was 2,234,326. The Act does not apply to Northern Ireland.

Mental Health Act 1983

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation to provide an appeal procedure whereby an aggrieved party under section 62(3) of the Mental Health Act 1983 may contest a judgment made under that section; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. The enactment of the provisions in the Mental Health Act 1983 concerning consent to treatment and the related safeguards followed extensive debate in Parliament. These provisions are now being closely monitored by the Mental Health Act Commission who will no doubt bring to our notice any difficulties arising under this Section of the Mental Health Act.

If the hon. Member would care to let me have details of any specific matter which he believes may give cause for concern, I shall be glad to look into it.

NHS Assets (Disposal)

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether it is Her Majesty's Government's policy that funds generated by the disposal of assets by the National Health Service should accrue to the sole benefit of the National Health Service without any offsetting reduction in the departmental vote.

Mr. John Patten: The expenditure plans set out in the recent Public Expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) recognised that the National Health Service would have available all the funds released through sales of assets in addition to the sums allocated from central Government. The Government's policy is that the capital funding which health authorities have available to them should be adequate to meet their needs for investment in the maintenance, modernisation and necessary development of health infrastruture, including rationalisation, improved efficiency and lower running costs wherever attainable.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information has been sent by his Department to community health councils regarding the proposals to limit the range of medicines prescribable under the National Health Service; when such information was sent and by what means; how many councils have commented on the proposals; and what percentage of community health councils this number represents.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Community health councils have not been separately consulted on the limited list proposals, but their Association has submitted comments as has at least one individual Council.

Adoptions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children have been adopted in each of the years since 1966; and how many of these children were males and how many were females.

Mr. John Patten: The information required is in the table:

Adoptions of children—England and Wales

Year	Males	Females	Total
1966	11,616	11,176	22,792
1967	11,553	11,249	22,802

1982	5,305	4,935	10,240
1983	4,640	4,389	9,029

Note: From 1973 onwards figures relate to persons under 18: previously they related to persons under age 21.

Social Security Reviews

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will agree to publish the individual reports of each social security review team;

(2) when he proposes to publish his report of the social security reviews; and whether it will take the form of a White Paper.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which social security benefits have now been examined by his Department; which benefits are now being examined; which of the reports on benefits are to be published; and when they will be available.

Mr. Newton: We are undertaking a wide-ranging review covering all aspects of social security, and in particular provision for retirement, supplementary benefit, housing benefit and benefits for children and young people. It is hoped that the Government's conclusions and proposals for change will be announced in the course of the next few months. A decision on the form and content of the publication will be taken nearer the time.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the organisations that have submitted evidence to the social security reviews, indicating those which were invited to give oral evidence.

Mr. Newton: A list of the organisations which gave oral evidence to the social security review teams was included in my reply to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 31 October at columns 1081 and 1083. The organisations which submitted written evidence were as follows:

Youth Action Charter, Edinburgh

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all those organisations which asked to give oral evidence to the social security reviews but were not called to do so.

Mr. Newton: The following organisations asked to give oral evidence but were not called to do so:

Supplementary Benefit Review: Oxford Unemployed Workers and Claimants' Union
Children and Young Persons Review: National Confederation of Parent-Teachers' Associations
Inquiry into Provision for Retirement: Pensioners' Link
Housing Benefit Review: None

West Midlands RHA (Review)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any representatives of district health authorities will sit on the steering committee which will guide the review by outside consultants of the functions and working of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The detailed arrangements for this review have yet to be made.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are his plans for the future of resettlement units and re-establishment centres.

Mr. Newton: The supplementary benefit division of the Department currently runs resettlement units which provide temporary board and lodging for people without a settled way of life with a view to influencing them to lead a more settled way of life. Alongside these, mostly on the same sites, it also runs re-establishment centres at which the long-term unemployed are given training to help to fit them for return to employment.

This provision, which is largely a relic of the Poor Law workhouses, has come to seem increasingly anomalous in the context of the responsibilities now exercised by local authority housing and social services departments, and the expanded training responsibility of the Manpower Services Commission. Since 1981 the Department has been carrying through a scheme to replace Camberwell resettlement unit, whose lease is due to expire at the end of this year. More recently we have been reviewing the future of the resettlement units and re-establishment centres generally. We have taken particular account of the fact that some of the units are in a state which would require significant capital expenditure if their present role were to continue, and of the evidence that, despite the conscientious and caring work of resettlement unit staff, the resettlement units have proved less successful in their stated role than voluntary hostels directed to the same end.

In the light of these considerations we have now decided to work towards the gradual closure of resettlement units, in association with measures to promote the development of better alternative arrangements to meet the needs of people without a settled way of life, and to close the re-establishment centres as soon as possible. There will be full consultation with the trade unions about the effect of these changes on the staff of the resettlement units and the re-establishment centres.

The initiatives in more detail are as follows:

Resettlement Units Outside London

Outside London, a process of regional consultation with voluntary organisations and local authorities is to be launched to identify alternative arrangements for resettling people without a settled way of life in accordance with my right hon. Friend's statutory obligation. The aim will be the closure of the most dilapidated units over the next three years or so to avoid wasteful expenditure on them. The future of the other units outside London will be considered further in the light of proposals coming forward from the voluntary sector. The resources saved will be used to finance alternative schemes in the voluntary sector.

Resettlement Units in London

Until the Camberwell replacement scheme is further advanced, no action will be taken on the other seven London resettlement units and their future will be reviewed later.

Re-Establishment Centres

All re-establishment centres will be closed as soon as possible. Again, the resources saved will be used to finance resettlement schemes in the voluntary sector.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons stayed in the 23 resettlement units provided by his Department on the night of 30 November 1984; how many of those were eligible for housing accommodation from a local housing authority by virtue of being vulnerable through old age, mental illness or handicap, physical disability or pregnancy, under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977; and what arrangements exist between each of the 23 resettlement units and local housing authorities for the rehousing of those homeless people who are vulnerable under the Act.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 165]: A total of 1,578 persons stayed in the 23 DHSS resettlement units on the night of 30 November 1984. It is not known how many of them were eligible for housing under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. Resettlement unit staff have formed close working relationships with local authority housing and social service departments in order to help such persons.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many beds were provided in each of the 23 resettlement units during the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available; and what was the average rate of occupancy for each unit during the same period.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 165-66]: The table shows how many beds were provided in each of the 23 DHSS resettlement units during the 12 months ended 20 November 1984 and the average occupancy for each unit during that period.

Unit	Beds available per night (averaged out where necessary)	Average occupancy level (per cent.)

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, during the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available, how many individuals were provided, when leaving each of the 23 resettlement units, with accommodation under the following categories: (a) local authority tenancies, (b) housing association tenancies and (c) local authority part III accommodation.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 165-66]: The following table shows the number of individuals provided with various categories of accommodation on leaving the resettlement units during the 12 months ended 20 November 1984.

Ex-prisoners (Accommodation)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to enable ex-prisoners to be allocated accommodation or lodgings soon after being released.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

Arrangements already exist to assist prisoners to find accommodation on release. As I stated in my reply to a question from the hon. Member on 22 November at column 263 we are reviewing the voluntary after-care scheme, which provides accommodation for ex-prisoners, with a view to assessing need and effectiveness more accurately.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has on the numbers of supplementary benefits claimants of 25 years or under who have moved from their parents' homes in the most recently available period, broken down into the following categories: (a) those who were treated as non-householders in their new accommodation, (b) those who were treated as boarders in their new accommodation and (c) those who were treated as householders or joint householders in their new accommodation;

(2) what are the most recently available figures for the numbers of young supplementary benefit claimants who are living in their parents' homes, broken down into the following categories: (a) 16 and 17-year-olds, (b) 18 to 20-year-olds and (c) 21 to 25-year-olds; and what was the average amount of benefit paid for each of these groups;

(3) what are the most recently available figures for the numbers of young supplementary benefit claimants who are treated as boarders, broken down into the following categories: (a) 16 and 17-year-olds, (b) 18 to 20-year-olds and (c) 21 to 25-year-olds; and what was the average amount of benefit paid to each of these groups.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 27 November 1984, c. 469]: The latest information we have comes from the annual statistical inquiry of December 1983. It is provisional and not exactly in the form requested. In particular we have no information about young people who have moved from their parents' homes. The figures are as follows:

Type of accommodation	Claimants by age ranges
	16 to 17	18 to 20	21 to 25
Board and lodging and hostel	6,700	13,300	17,200
Average amount of supplementary benefit	£45·29	£47·49	*
All non-householders	158,300	334,100	206,000
Average amount of supplementary benefit	£16·95	£24·18	*
Householders	8,100	75,400	232,400
Average amount of supplementary benefit	£27·62	£31·30	*

* Not available.

We would expect most young claimants who are non-householders to be in their parents' households. The average benefit figures are net of other income such as unemployment benefit which falls to be taken into account in the supplementary benefit assessment.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many public sector tenants in Scotland are receiving housing benefit; of these how many are in receipt of full benefit; and what each of these figures represents as a percentage of the total number of public sector tenants in Scotland.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 5 December 1984, c. 223]: It is estimated that in autumn 1983, the latest date for which estimates are available, about 650,000 public sector tenants were receiving housing benefit in Scotland, about 270,000 of whom were receiving full benefit. These figures represent broadly 64 per cent. and 27 per cent. respectively of the total number of public sector tenants in Scotland.

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish his circular on family practitioner committees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 57]: We are preparing a range of guidance for family practitioner committees to assist them in developing their new independent role. Information on accountability and certain financial matters has already been issued.

ENVIRONMENT

Sports Office

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of administration of the Sports Office within his Department, expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Macfarlane: The total administrative costs at 1979-80 prices of the Department's sports and recreation division over the last five years were as follows:

1979-80	204,000
1980-81	195,000
1981-82	172,000
1982-83	173,000
1983-84	226,000

Metropolitan Counties (Land Banks)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has yet been able to establish the extent and approximate value of the land banks held by the metropolitan counties; and if he will publish a summary of the information currently available to him in respect of such land holdings and his intentions regarding their disposal.

Mr. Macfarlane: Details of vacant and under-used land owned by the metropolitan county councils are already publicly available in the registers established under part X of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. We intend shortly to seek such further information from these councils as is needed to prepare for the proposed transfers of property consequential upon the enactment of the Local Government Bill. Those proposals were set out in paragraph 3.3 of the document "Abolition of the GLC and MCCs: the Government's proposals for transferring functions to London boroughs and metropolitan districts", published by my Department in July 1984.

Council Houses

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of homes managed by each district council within the metropolitan county and Greater London council areas; how many voids awaiting repair there are in each district and what was the number of voids brought back into habitation in the last year and the number of years at current rates that it will take to bring all voids in each district back into a habitable condition.

Sir George Young: Each local authority reported in its 1984 housing investment programme return the number of dwellings which it owned within its own area, and, of these, the numbers which were undergoing repair or improvement and those awaiting repair or improvement at 1 April 1984: copies of these returns are in the Library. Information is not collected by the Department on the number of vacant dwellings becoming available for letting after repair.

Local Authorities (Rates and Employment)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the report on local authority rates and employment carried out for his Department by the department of land economy at Cambridge university; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) on 31 January, at column 282.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer of 25 January, Official Report, column 556, he will explain why (a) plutonium-240 is included in the plutonium-239 figure, (b) plutonium-242 has never been analysed separately and (c) how his Department judges or estimates the mass of the plutonium discharged to sea from the Sellafield Windscale plant in the light of the lack of these separate analyses.

Mr. Waldegrave: The analytical technique employed cannot distinguish between plutonium-240 and plutonium-239 which in any case have similar radio toxicities. Plutonium-242 has never been analysed separately since the quantities involved are negligible being less than one-thousandth part of the sum of plutonium-239 and plutonium-240. My Department is concerned primarily with the radiological effects of discharges which are related to radioactivity rather than mass. If necessary, the mass of plutonium discharged can be calculated from the known relationship between the radioactivity, which is measured, and mass. In the case of the mixture of plutonium-239 and plutonium-240, a ratio of the two may be calculated for this purpose using the principles of nuclear physics.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 24 January, Official Report, column 484, if he will give the date of the meeting of the London Docklands Development Corporation at which the application for a grant or contract to Inter-Action was approved; and what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that that decision was in accordance with the recommendation of the House of Lords Select Committee on the London Docklands Development Corporation Order, paragraph 8.7 (HL 198 of 1980) and with his reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South of 9 January, Official Report, column 473.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 30 January 1985, c. 172]: My Department is now considering an application which was approved by the LDDC board at its last meeting in January, but no decision has yet been made. The board first considered a project application in May 1984.

Nottingham and Nottinghamshire

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the special grants to the city of Nottingham over the past two years.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 422]: Grants under my Department's special grants programme are paid to voluntary bodies only. Grant of the sort I believe my hon. Friend had in mind was paid to Nottingham city council as follows:

	1982-83 £	1983-84 £	1984-85 (to date) £
Grants under the urban programme (including urban development grant)	900,112	1,538,816	989,479
Derelict land grant	109,554	63,900	31,260

Where grant is paid on a loan charge basis, the amount paid each year represents only a small proportion of the total expenditure approved for grant.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the special grants to the Nottinghamshire county council over the past two years.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his reply, 4 February 1985, c. 422]: Grants under my Department's special grants programme are paid to voluntary bodies only. Grant of the sort I believe my hon. Friend had in mind was paid to Nottinghamshire county council as follows:

	1982-83 £	1983-84 £	1984-85 (to date) £
Grants under the urban programme	1,205,787	1,540,339	719,366
Derelict land grant	562,550	1,786,012	696,182

Where grant is paid on a loan charge basis, the amount paid each year represents only a small proportion of the total expenditure approved for grant.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 6 February 1985

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Admiral of the Fleet

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General what plans he has to prosecute the Admiral of the Fleet, Lord Lewin, for revealing information about the operation of Her Majesty's submarines, contrary to section 2 of the Official Secrets Act.

The Attorney-General: I refer to my reply of 1 February 1985 to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). He has now written to me with some information and I am having inquiries made.

Supreme Court Rules

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Attorney-General when section 6 of the Administration of Justice Act 1982 will be implemented.

The Attorney-General: The draft rules of court which accompanied the consultation paper on awards of provisional and further damages issued by the Lord Chancellor's Department on 20 September 1984 are being revised in the light of responses received to that paper, which reflected differing opinions and conflicting interests. This matter is being pressed forward as quickly as possible. I can give no specific promises as to timing, but the Lord Chancellor expects to place proposals before the Supreme Court rule committee in the near future with a view to bringing section 6 into force as soon as possible.

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Attorney-General when proposed amendments to the Supreme Court rules making provisions for awards for provisional damages will be laid before the House.

The Attorney-General: I refer to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member's question on this subject earlier today. The statutory instrument amending rules of court is subject to negative resolution and will accordingly be laid before Parliament once it has been made.

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Attorney-General if he will make it his policy in the forthcoming amendments to the Supreme Court rules making provisions for awards of provisional damages not to impose a time limit within which application for further awards must be made.

The Attorney-General: I refer to the answer I gave to the hon. Member's question on this subject earlier today. The question of a time limit for claims for further damages is one of the matters the rule committee will consider in the light of the responses that have been received.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Dumping at Sea

71. Mr. Hill asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what controls exist at present to monitor licensed applications for dumping at sea.

Mr. MacGregor: In accordance with a predetermined programme, regular checks are made of both the materials to be dumped and the vessels to be used in connection with licences issued under the Dumping at Sea Act 1974. Similarly, the state of the marine environment, both at the dumping site and elsewhere, is kept under regular scientific surveillance within the framework of defined monitoring programmes.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Farm Capital Grant

Mr. Chapman asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to extend a streamlined prior notification system for farm capital grant to cover the whole countryside in accordance with the recommendation in the Environment Committee report on the operational effectiveness of the Wildlife and Countryside Act.

Mrs. Fenner: This is one of a number of recommendations in the report which we are currently considering.

WALES

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the cost of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The nationalised industry, non-departmental public bodies and organisations for which my Department is responsible or to which it provides funds of more than £100,000 per annum are as follows: categorised broadly as requested, though detailed information on particular services and charges is not held centrally for reasons of cost. No services provided by my Department for which charges are raised incur full costs of more than £100,000 per annum.

(a) Royal Commission on Ancient and Historical Monuments in Wales.
Housing Corporation.

(b) Cwmbran Development Corporation.
Development Board for Rural Wales.
National Library of Wales.
National Museum of Wales.
Sports Council for Wales.
Wales Tourist Board.
Welsh Development Agency.
Welsh National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting.
National Health Service related services.
Ancient Monuments—Admissions.

(c) Welsh Water Authority.
Ancient Monuments—Commercial Sales.

University Hospital of Wales

Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will seek the agreement of the parties to publication of the terms of settlement reached in respect of defects in the construction of the University hospital of Wales, Cardiff.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The defects in question arose from construction between 1966 and 1969 and were of two main categories, mosaic cladding and structural defects. Counsel advised the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation against pursuing a claim for the recovery of the cost of remedial measures in respect of the structural defects. The Public Accounts Committee was informed of this on 14 November 1983: a summary of the main features of counsel's advice had been given to it in March 1982. They were told that action was continuing in respect of the mosaics.

Having taken further advice from counsel, WHTSO signed an agreement with the architects, the consulting engineers and the liquidators of the building contractors on 24 November 1983 primarily concerned with the mosaic cladding but also in full and final settlement of all claims in respect of all defects in the building known at that time. The agreement stipulated that it should remain confidential to the parties, saving that WHTSO could disclose the terms in full to the Welsh Office, and envisaged subsequent disclosure in confidence to the Public Accounts Committee. This has been done.

I have asked the parties to the settlement to agree to wider publication of its terms. One party has objected. However, I have decided that in the public interest details of the settlement should be made available to the House. Accordingly, I have placed in the Library a copy of the agreement, together with copies of the related counsel's opinion and the previous counsel's opinion to which I have referred.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Commission (Assets)

Mr. Greenway asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what is the total value of all the assets of the Church Commission; what was the income of the Church Commission in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Sir William van Straubenzee: As at 31 December 1983 the total value of the assets of the Church Commissioners, excluding £30,592,000 held for particular beneficiaries, amounted to £1,599,827,000.

The income from the Commissioners' own assets for the last 10 years was as follows:

	£ million
1973-74	28·4
1974-75	30·1
1975-76	33·4
1976-77	36·9
1977-78	40·0
1978-79	46·2
9 months to 31 December 1979*	41·7
1980	59·3
1981	64·2
1982	69·5
1983	76·0

* Denotes change from financial year to calendar year.

TRANSPORT

Buses

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if it is his intention fully to protect all employees' pension rights and conditions in his forthcoming legislation on buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Transport Bill contains no provisions relating to pensions of employees and pensioners of district council or PTE bus undertakings, since we anticipate that satisfactory arrangements can be made under existing legislation. The Bill does contain powers relating to pension arrangements for National Bus Company employees and pensioners. We shall be discussing the pension issues with the National Bus Company and local government representatives.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsiblity or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Ridley: The nationalised industries sponsored by my Department are British Airways, British Rail, the British Airports Authority, the National Bus Company, London Regional Transport and the Civil Aviation Authority. They operate to financial targets which take account of their particular circumstances, revenue potential, internal resources and, where appropriate, subsidies. In addition, there are a number of harbour authorities which have received loans from the Consolidated Fund, but for whose fees and charges I have no direct responsibility. The Mersey Harbour Authority and the Port of London Authority also receive grant support.

Other non-governmental organisations and agencies sponsored by, or receiving funds from, my Department are:

(a) No charge made
Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents
National Advisory Unit for community Transport
Air Travel Reserve Fund Agency
World Maritime University
Advisory Committee on Historic Wreck Sites
Advisory Committee on the Landscape Treatment of Trunk Roads
Standing Advisory Committee on the Carriage of Dangerous Goods in Ships
Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment
Honorary Medical Advisory Panel for Driving and Disorders of the Nervous System
Panel of Advisers on Disability

(b) Charges did not fully cover costs in 1983-84
Commonwealth Air Transport Council
North Atlantic Air Navigation Service

(c) Charges fully recovered costs in 1983-84
General Lighthouse Authorities
Pilotage Commission
Euro-control Air Navigation Services
Red Sea Lights Company Ltd

(d) Charges more than covered costs in 1983-84
Airport Air Traffic Services

The costs of certain other bodies sponsored by the Department, the Transport Tribunal and the traffic commissioners and licensng authorities, are recovered through the fees of the appropriate departmental services.

Services provided to the general public or to private organisations by my Department which in the financial year 1983-84 cost more than £100,000 are:

(a) No charge made
Weather/gale warnings to shipping
Navigation warnings
Marine search and rescue (HM Coastguard)
Ship inspection and port state control
Civil hydrography
Marking of wrecks and disposal of war works
Channel Navigation Information Service
Publication of results of research at the Transport and Road Research Laboratory
Provision and maintenance of trunk roads
Maintenance of vehicle records
Road safety guidance and publicity
Control and routeing of abnormal indivisible loads

(b) Charges did not fully cover cost in 1983-84
Fishing vessel surveys
Marine pollution services
Marine surveys*
Examination and certification of seamen*†
Public Service Vehicle type and initial fitness testing†
Road service licences
Public Service Vehicle driver licensing
Heavy Goods Vehicle driver licensing
Public Service Vehicle driver testing
Motorcycle Part 1 rider testing and supervision of Approved Training Bodies
Register of Approved Driving Instructors†
Vehicle and component approvals*
Severn Bridge tolled crossing

Note:
* Fees recovered more than 90 per cent. of the costs of these services in 1983-84;
† Adjustments to either fees or costs of these services since 1983-84 have been made to achieve full recovery.

(c) Charges fully recovered costs in 1983-84
Use of Transport and Road Research Laboratory test track by outside bodies
Supply of highway, transport and traffic statistics

(d) Charges more than covered costs in 1983-84
Heavy Goods Vehicle driver testing‡
L-driver testing‡
Goods vehicle operator licences
Public Service Vehicle operator licences
Heavy Goods Vehicle testing‡
Public Service Vehicle testing‡
Marine radio surveys‡
Driver licences‡
Fee paying vehicle licensing and registration transactions (enquiries, duplicates)‡
Transfer of cherished vehicle registration marks
International road freight permits‡

Note:
‡ Charges for these services are set to recover full costs. Small surpluses in 1983-84 are due to variances from forecasts, or adjustments between years.

Road Accidents

Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Transport over the most recent three years, respectively, for which figures are available, what were the numbers of road accidents contributed to by (a) epilepsy and (b) heart attacks.

Mrs. Chalker: Causes are not recorded on road accident reports and therefore I regret that no figures are available.

Large Vehicles (Reversing Alarms)

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to assist large vehicles to reverse more safely.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government have decided to make provisions for the use of audible reversing alarms. Although these alarms have been illegal in many circumstances up to now, I know that a number of local authorities and bus companies have been using them as a useful safety device for some time. We are now establishing a legal framework to allow their use on certain types of vehicle with suitable safeguards to avoid their becoming a nuisance.

Regulations have been laid down which will permit the use of reversing alarms on commercial vehicles over 2 tonnes gross weight, on large passenger vehicles with nine or more seats, including the driver, on engineering plant and on works trucks. But the alarms will still be illegal on private cars.

The alarms will be subject to the same night-time restrictions as apply to the standard horn and must not be capable of being confused with the "safe to cross" signal on a pelican crossing.

This change in the regulations does not diminish the responsibilities of the driver, who must always take the greatest care with any reversing manoeuvre.

PRIME MINISTER

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what response she is making to the resolutions adopted and drawn to her attention by the Greater Manchester police authority concerning the cost of the miners' dispute and its effects on the policing of Greater Manchester; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: This resolution was drawn to my attention by the right hon. Member in his letter of 4 February, to which I have asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to reply.

Official Information (Public Access)

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister (1) what specific action she has taken since 1979 to extend public access to official information; and if she will make a statement;

(2) what plans she has to introduce legislation relating to freedom of information; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We have a clear policy to make as much information available as possible while preserving the confidentiality essential to the effective working of the Government. I asked Ministers in charge of Departments to give this their close personal attention when we took office in 1979, and a very wide range of information is now available as a result.

I remain unconvinced that legislation to give a statutory general right of access to official information would suit our system of government or give a better result in terms of the essential accountability of the Government to Parliament and the electorate.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committees

Mr. Mason asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the overseas visits undertaken by the 14 Select Committees since 1979; for what purpose they were undertaken; how many officers and advisers accompanied each delegation; and what have been the total costs incurred by each Committee on these visits.

Mr. Biffen [pursuant to his reply, 30 January 1985, c. 184]: The information is given in the following table:

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Statistics (Racial Analysis)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a copy of his reply to a letter from the chairman of the community/police consultative group for Lambeth dated 15 January about the publication of racial analysis of crime statistics.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We will be writing shortly to the chairman of the community/police consultative group for Lambeth and will send the hon. Member a copy of the letter.

Queen's Police Medal

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria he bears in mind when putting forward the names of individuals with a recommendation that they be awarded the Queen's Police Medal.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The qualifications for the grant of the Queen's Police Medal are set out in regulations made under the Royal Warrant in 1954. They include special or valuable services in various capacities, distinguished administrative or organisational work and prolonged service distinguished by very exceptional ability and merit.

Metropolitan Police

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many meetings with London local authorities have taken place since the publication to London borough councils of Sir Kenneth Newman's intended changes in the structure of the Metropolitan police force on 20 November 1984, to discuss these proposals; and with which authorities.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has had a meeting with the London Boroughs Association and he intends to consult widely as the reorganisation proceeds.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the bodies to whom Sir Kenneth Newman wrote on 20 November 1984 outlining the conclusions of his review "Organisational and Managerial Support for the Strategic Goals of the Force".

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that he wrote to all right hon. and hon. Members for constituencies wholly or partly within the Metropolitan police district; to the chief executives of borough and district councils within the Metropolitan police district; and to the chairmen of a number of police/community consultative groups.

Private Investigators

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department has at any time used the services of private investigators to monitor the activities of (a) striking miners, (b) peace organisations and (c) environmental pressure groups; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

Special Branch (Information Processing)

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied that the information held by the special branch in the Metropolitan police area is updated and weeded out and that unnecessary information is destroyed in the way recommended in his Department's guidelines of December 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes.

Post Office Detector Van Service

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the annual cost on both capital and revenue account for each of the past five years of the Post Office detector van service.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The charges to the Home Office for the detector van service were as follows:

	Capital costs £	Operating costs £
1979-80	60,000	1,113,000
1980-81	25,000	1,317,000
1981-82	15,000	1,362,000
1982-83	12,000	985,000
1983-84	59,000	668,000

Metropolitan Police Unit C11

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement about the role of the Metropolitan police unit C11;

(2) upon whose authority the Metropolitan police unit C11 operates;

(3) if he will state (a) who is eligible to make requests and (b) who has made requests for the Metropolitan police unit C11 to operate in particular cases;

(4) what police computers and electronic surveillance equipment and technology is available to the Metropolitan police unit C11.

Mr. Giles Shaw: C11 branch is part of the criminal investigation department of the Metropolitan police, reporting to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis through the assistant commissioner, C department. Its officers are drawn from all branches of the police service, and are generally attached to C11 branch for limited periods. They are subject to normal supervisory control through the ordinary police chain of command.

C11 branch contributes to inquiries being conducted by other parts of the Metropolitan police, and by other police forces, through the acquisition and assessment of intelligence about the activities of those suspected of involvement in major crime.

The central drugs intelligence unit, which is part of C11 branch, is, however, a common police service with a steering committee under the chairmanship of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary, and officers of the CDIU are central service appointments, not serving Metropolitan police officers.

The use of surveillance equipment by C11 officers is subject to the same rules and procedures as apply to other parts of the police service. Revised and tightened Home Office guidelines on the use of surveillance equipment by the police were issued on 19 December 1984, and a copy of them was placed in the Library of the House. Officers of C11 branch have access to the computer facilities dedicated to C department and, on the same basis as other police officers, to the police national computer.

Firearms and Knives (Offences)

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in each of the past five calendar years how many cases of criminal offences involving (a) firearms and (b) knives were recorded.

Mr. Mellor: The available information on firearms relates to notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been used and is given in tables 3.1 and 3.2 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1983", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The available information on knives relates only to offences currently recorded as homicide in which sharp instruments were used, which is published in table 4.3 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1983".

Special Constabulary

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance is issued to special constables about their powers of arrest; and in what ways such guidance differs from that issued to police constables.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Within the police area for which he is appointed and in contiguous police areas a special constable has the same powers of arrest as a regular constable. Guidance is issued by the Home Office to chief officers of police, as the need arises, on particular legislation, which may include powers of arrest, but such guidance does not distinguish between the exercise of such powers by regular or by special constables.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by police force area, the number of special constables.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is collected annually. I shall write to my hon. Friend when figures for 31 December 1984 are available.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the letter of 28 January written to the hon. Member for Yeovil following the answer given to his question on 17 December 1984, Official Report, column 10.

Mr. Mellor The text of my reply is as follows:

I am sorry that I have not been able to write to you sooner with a substantive reply to your Question of 17 December about the jurisdiction of the United States authorities over their servicemen in this country. The terms in which you couched your Question are, of course, entirely hypothetical; no case has ever occurred in which a United States serviceman has, in the course of his official duties, shot a United Kingdom citizen.

We have no plans for amending the Visiting Forces Act 1952 which, as you know, gives effect to the 1951 NATO Agreement on the Status of Forces. I believe that the Agreement and the statute provide a workable and satisfactory legal basis for foreign forces in this country.

On the specific point raised in your Question—jurisdiction over a United States serviceman who shot a British citizen—I think it important to keep in mind the distinction between, on the one hand, the application of UK Law, and on the other, the respective jurisdictions of the visiting force's service courts and of our civilian courts. In view of your known interest in the Visiting Forces Act, I doubt if I need spell out the provisions of the Act which deal with jurisdiction. As you know, it is the operation of section 3 of the Act which appears to cause most concern, dealing as it does with concurrent jurisdiction.

Section 3 provides that, if a United States serviceman commits an act which is an offence against the law of both the United States and the United Kingdom, in most cases it will be the United Kingdom courts which have primary rights to deal with the offence. The only exceptions to this rule occur in the event—envisaged by your Question—that the offence arose out of and in the course of duty, or it was committed solely against persons or property associated with the visiting force. In such cases, the primary jurisdiction is exercised by the authorities of the visiting force, but the United Kingdom courts have a secondary right of jurisdiction which they may exercise if the authorities of the visiting force decide not to exercise their primary right of jurisdiction and deal with the case under their own law.

It is difficult to speculate on what action might be taken under the 1952 Act if an incident ever occurred in which a United States serviceman, in the course of his duty, shot a British citizen. Much would turn on the particular circumstances of the incident. Clearly the authorities of the visiting force would have to consider whether excessive force had been used and thus whether an offence had been committed. In doing so they would need to take account of the provisions of our law (in particular, section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967), and would no doubt be sensitive to the need to consult our authorities about any action to be taken. If it appeared that an offence had been committed under both US and UK law but the US authorities decided to take no action, the UK authorities would be entitled to exercise jurisdiction. In addition, even if the US authorities had primary jurisdiction in a particular case, under the terms of the Status of Forces Agreement (Article VII, paragraph 3) they would have a duty to give sympathetic consideration to a request from us to waive their jurisdiction. They are also under a duty (Article VII, paragraph 6(a) to provide assistance in the investigation of offences and in the collection and production of evidence.

As I said in the Parliamentary debate on 19 December 1983, if any case arose in which the United States authorities appeared to be adopting what seems to be an unreasonably extensive interpretation of what constitutes official duty, we would not hesitate to make the most strenuous representations to ensure that the spirit, as well as the letter, of the NATO agreement was fully respected.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Brittan: The Management and Personnel Office publication "Public Bodies 1984" lists the non-governmental organisations for which I have responsibilities. The grants made to voluntary bodies by my Department in 1983-84 were listed in the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 4 December 1984 at columns 129-31.

Comprehensive information about charges which may be made by all these bodies is not immediately available. The following information pertains to those services costing over £100,000 a year for which I am directly responsible, or for which I approve fees:

(a) Services costing over £100,000 a year where fees or charges did not cover costs in 1983-84:

i. Licensing of firearms by police authorities (fees for which are currently under review);
ii. issue of travel document by the Home Office for stateless persons (the charge for which is limited by international convention to that for a passport); and
iii. clamping and removal of illegally parked vehicles by the metropolitan police (charges for which are currently under review).

(b) Services costing over £100,000 a year where fees or charges are known, or estimated, to have covered costs in 1983-84:

i. Dealing with nationality applications in the Home Office;
ii. inspection of premises under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971;
iii. accommodation of passengers refused entry under the Immigration Act 1971 (where charges are made to the carrying companies);
iv. issue of liquor licences by magistrates' courts;
v. issue of gaming and betting licences by the Gaming Board for Great Britain and magistrates' courts;
vi. issue of aliens' registration certificates;
vii. issue of police reports on road traffic accidents; and viii. issue of passports.

Social Workers (Criminal Records)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will include in his current review of the need to disclose to employers of people seeking work with children any relevant details of criminal convictions, those seeking to work in the field of residential care for the elderly and the physically and mentally handicapped.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This review is primarily directed to the need to protect children from those who by reason of their criminal past are unfit to work with children. But we recognise that there are other areas of employment, such as those referred to by my hon. Friend, where a case can be made for disclosure, and we are prepared to consider any evidence of the need in such areas.

Civil Defence

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) which two county councils did not return the questionnaire on civil defence by December 1984;

(2) how many local authorities completed the questionnaire on civil defence in each of the following home defence regions: (a) north, (b) Yorkshire, (c) east midlands, (d) east, (e) Greater London, (f) south-east, (g) south-west, (h) Wales, (i) west midlands and (j) north-west.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The questionnaire was directed to county councils and the GLC. All of these replied by December 1984 except Gwynedd, which has now replied, and Mid-Glamorgan.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the district or borough councils which have chosen sites for an emergency control centre;

(2) if he will list the district or borough councils which have an emergency control centre; and what is the cost or proposed cost for each authority.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Comprehensive information in this form is not held centrally.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which local authorities have sent (a) elected members and (b) appropriate officers to training courses at the Civil Defence college.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information in the form requested is not readily available, but all county councils and most district and borough councils in England and Wales have sent elected members and officers to such courses.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the national voluntary organisations actively participating in civil defence training.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The national voluntary organisations concerned are as follows:

Red Cross Society
St. John Ambulance
Women's Royal Voluntary Service
Royal Observer Corps
United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation Warning Teams
Volunteer Scientific Advisers
National Voluntary Civil Aid Society
Radio Amateur Emergency Network

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to meet the chief executive of any counties to discuss civil defence plans.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Not at present. Home Office officials are in regular contact wih the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the 45 authorities mentioned in the summary of local authority returns to the civil defence questionnaire which have made some civil defence plans;

(2) which four local authorities have civil defence plans in accordance with the 1983 Civil Defence Regulations;

(3) which 24 local authorities are updating civil defence plans from plans made in accordance with the 1974 Civil Defence Regulations.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Since this information was provided in confidence, I would not be justified in disclosing it.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which 48 county councils have one, two or three emergency centres, respectively; and what was the cost or proposed cost for each authority.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Fifty-one county councils have designated one or more emergency centres. I shall write to the hon. Member with the details. Detailed information on costs is not available.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the terms of reference of the study being conducted in the north-west home defence region into the co-ordination of regional home defence planning.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The terms of this study will be to

(i) define the requirements for co-ordination of regional home defence planning taking account of the particular circumstances of the region;
(ii) identify the options for meeting in whole or in part those requirements;
(iii) assess the cost and effectiveness of the options by trial so far as practicable and necessary; and

(iv) make proposals as to which option should be preferred, isolating special or relevant regional circumstances with a view to ensuring so far as possible that the findings are applicable to other home defence regions.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which (a) county councils and (b) district or borough councils have recruited individual civil defence volunteers and voluntary organisations, respectively, for civil defence training.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The following counties have recruited individual civil defence volunteers: Northumberland, Durham, Tyne and Wear, South Yorkshire, North Yorkshire, West Yorkshire, Humberside, Northamptonshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire, Essex, Norfolk, Hertfordshire, Suffolk, Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Greater London council, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, East Sussex, Hampshire, Isle of Wight, Kent, Oxfordshire, Surrey, West Sussex, Devon, Avon, Cornwall, Dorset, Gloucestershire, Somerset, Wiltshire, Gwent, Dyfed, South Glamorgan, Powys, Clwyd, West Glamorgan, Salop, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, Hereford and Worcester, West Midlands, Greater Manchester, Merseyside, Cheshire, Cumbria, Lancashire.

It is not known how many district or borough councils have recruited civil defence volunteers.

Neither counties nor district or borough councils recruit voluntary organisations for civil defence training.

Scientific Advisers (Training)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which local authorities give scientific adviser training.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information on training given by local authorities is not held centrally, but scientific advisers from 40 county authorities in England and Wales have attended regional or national courses since the 1983 regulations came into effect.

Parole

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times in the last two years a unanimous recommendation of the national review committee that a prisoner be granted parole has been rejected by him; and if he will list the crimes and convictions and prison-status, in terms of category of prisoner, of the person or persons involved.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information is published in the annual reports of the Parole Board. These show that in 1983, out of the 3,460 cases of determinate sentence prisoners in which the Parole Board recommended release, the Home Secretary was unable to accept the board's recommendation in 17 cases; in 1982, out of 3,158 cases, 20. It has never been the practice to identify individual cases, the kinds of cases involved, or whether the recommendations in question were made unanimously.

Immigration

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average waiting time prior to gaining permanent admission to the United Kingdom in 1984; and how this compares with each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Waddington: Information for 1977 to 1984 on the waiting time to first interview for persons in the Indian sub-continent applying for entry clearance for immediate settlement in the United Kingdom is given in table 9 of the Home Office statistical bulletin "Control of Immigration: Statistics, Third Quarter, 1984" (Issue 27/1984) and table 5, of "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom, 1983" (Cmnd. 9246). Applications are decided at the first interview unless further inquiries need to be made or a refusal is followed by an appeal, in which case the time taken depends upon the particular circumstances of the application. Corresponding information for years earlier than 1977, and for countries outside the Indian sub-continent, is not available.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were prosecuted in 1983 for failure to display a current road fund tax disc in circumstances where the car owner had purchased instalment stamps to the full value but was awaiting the issue of a tax disc.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The available information is for all proceedings at magistrates' courts for the offences of a motor vehicle licence being obscured or not affixed and of failure to pay motor vehicle duty and is published in table 5 of "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, 1983, Supplementary Tables", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Details of the circumstances of prosecutions are not collected centrally.

Marches and Processions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if has issued any circulars to chief constables in connection with marches and processions held by political and other organisations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Home Office issued a general circular to chief officers of police in May 1981 explaining the procedure to be followed when applying for an order banning marches or processions under section 3 of the Public Order Act 1936. I have arranged for a copy of this circular to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what have been the three most specific and narrow bans on processions made under the Public Order Act 1936 in the last 20 years; and if the legality of the specific and narrow nature of these bans was ever questioned in court;

(2) on how many occasions he has refused consent to an application from a chief constable to order a ban on any marches and processions under section 3(3) of the Public Order Act 1936 in each of the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Diplomats (Traffic Offences)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many parking tickets were evaded by diplomats in 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Cremation Certification (Inquiries)

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the result of his inquiries into suspicious deaths revealed in discrepancies in cremation certification reported to him by the British Medical Association.

Mr. Brittan: During the 12 months ended 31 March 1984 medical referees at crematoria completed a questionnaire about the cases coming before them and, in particular, any discrepancies between the two certificates completed by separate doctors in respect of each death. Of those cases where a discrepancy arose, the medical referees identified 18 which gave them cause for suspicion that death might have been criminally caused.

Eight of the discrepancies were found to arise solely from errors in reporting. A detailed check of the other 10 cases has established that the deaths occurred from natural causes.

Offenders (Reparation and Mediation)

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what grants he intends to make to reparation and mediation projects in respect of an offender and his victim; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I believe that direct reparation by an offender to his victim has a useful role to play in the criminal justice system. To promote the idea, and to help in appraising how it might usefully be developed, I decided last year that we should fund some experimental schemes. We have now offered grants, totalling about £100,000 a year for two years, to four projects, proposed by the Crypt Association, Wolverhampton, and Cumbria, West Midlands and West Yorkshire probation services.

The Cumbria scheme aims to divert juveniles from prosecution where reparation to the victim is agreed and made. The others envisage reparation by a convicted adult offender which would be associated with an order of the court. In all cases the victim's consent will be an essential condition of his or her participation. Since the schemes will be experimental, grants will be paid for two years only. The precise sums to be paid to each scheme will depend upon the terms and conditions agreed following discussions with my Department.

I am aware of a great deal of interest in promoting reparation in different parts of the country and of work being done or proposed independently of Home Office funding. We have received many worthwhile proposals which we have been unable to fund, but I hope that the Government's support for these schemes will serve to encourage others.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Licensable Technology

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list the constraints required to be imposed on East European purchasers of licensable technology by the COCOM agreement;

(2) if he will arrange to publish the COCOM list in the United Kingdom in the same form as it has been published in the United States of America.

Mr. Channon: Comprehensive details of the information required in support of export licence applications will appear in the revised version of the guidance booklet "Security Export Control" to be published by my Department when I make a new Export of Goods (Control) Order to implement in United Kingdom law the results of the recent COCOM list review.

COCOM

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether he will seek to renegotiate the recent COCOM agreement in the light of the legal objections raised to it under the general agreement on tariffs and trade and the treaty of Rome and in view of the recent statistics published by the United States Commerce Department of United States trade with the Soviet bloc and China in computers, semi-conductor manufacturing equipment and electronic test equipment;

(2) whether he is aware of any complaints being made under the treaty of Rome concerning the recent COCOM agreement; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether he is aware of any complaints being made under the general agreement on tariffs and trade concerning the recent COCOM agreement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I am aware that Czechoslovakia has notified COCOM's controls under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, but I am not aware that any complaint has been made under the treaty of Rome. Both the agreement and the treaty permit their signatories to control trade for reasons of national security. The COCOM lists are agreed unanimously and have just been reviewed. I see no reason to renegotiate them.

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if the average length of time taken to grant licences under the COCOM agreement when only the British Government's approval is required has increased over the last three months;

(2) what is the average length of time taken over the last three months to grant licences under the COCOM agreement when only British Government approval is required.

Mr. Channon: Information on the average length of time to grant licences when only the British Government's approval is required is not readily available. I am aware that the consideration of some applications has been prolonged. The procedures are kept under regular review.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he excluded the British Computer Society from negotiations over the COCOM agreement.

Mr. Channon: When considering the commercial implications of the strategic embargo my Department has attached priority to consulting trade associations. But I am always ready to consider the views of interested bodies. My Department met representatives of the British Computer Society on 25 January.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why his Department's discussions with the Computer Services Association on the COCOM list were conducted under the constraints of official secrecy.

Mr. Channon: During the early stage of policy formulation it is sometimes necessary to consult on a confidential basis. I hope that it will be possible to consult more widely before too long.

Departmental Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the total cost of the Administration of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Butcher: The total costs of administration of the Department for 1983-84, the year in which it was formed, together with the aggregate costs of the previously separate Departments of Trade and Industry for prior years are as follows, expressed in 1983-84 prices. The costs for 1979-80 are not comparable because of subsequent changes in accounting.

	£ million
1979-80	272·1
1980-81	304·7
1981-82	294·4
1982-83	288·7
1983-84	261·7

Merchant Navy Fleet

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will carry out a review of the problems of the Merchant Navy fleet arising from the reduction of trade carried by United Kingdom ships; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The Government have no plans to carry out such a review. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and I are of course ready to consider any particular problems drawn to our attention.

Insolvency Bill [Lords]

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why the Government have decided not to implement the recommendation of the Cork committee contained in chapter 32, paragraph 1450, subsections (b) (c) (e) and (g) of its report (Cmnd. 8558, in part I) to schedule 5 of the current Insolvency Bill [Lords] relating to the substantial reduction in the number and extent of the claims of preferential creditors.

Mr. Fletcher: The reasons why the Government decided that they were unable to accept the recommendations of the Insolvency Law Review Committee to which my hon. Friend refers were explained in the White Paper "A Revised Framework for Company Law" (Cmnd. 9175, February 1984). The principal reason relates to the significant difference between tax and non-tax debts; the former are imposed by law whereas the latter are incurred by agreement. The revenue collection departments and the local authorities are involuntary creditors, and consequently differ from other creditors in that they can not choose their debtors. In the Government's view, the retention of certain preferential rights is needed to compensate for this and for other relative disadvantages which we described in the White Paper.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Butcher: The nationalised industries and other public bodies with which my Department is concerned are listed at pages 61-65 in "Public Bodies 1984", which is available in the library. Since publication BT has ceased to be a nationalised industry. Grant-in-aid to non-Governmental bodies are shown in the Estimates.

The central aim of my Department is to encourage, assist, and ensure the proper regulation of British trade, industry, and commerce. Within this framework the services for which charges are made are as follows:

Services and groups of services the charges for which are aimed to recover full cost

- Patent Office
- Companies Registration Offices
- The Insolvency Service
- National Weights and Measures Laboratory
- Laboratory of the Government Chemist
- National Engineering Laboratory
- Warren Spring Laboratory
- National Physical Laboratory
- Licensing under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958
- Use of facilities at Royal Aircraft Establishment for European Space Agency Project
- National Remote Sensing Centre
- Dialtech (on-line computerised information service in science and technology)
- NATLAS — National Testing Laboratory Accreditation Scheme (The aim is breakeven in 1986-87)
- British Calibration Service
- National Corrosion Service

Because of unforeseen changes in demand and costs recoveries in any particular year may be more or less than full cost.

Services for which charges are not set ot recover full cost

- BOTB Export Services
- Small Firms counselling Service
- Wireless Telegraphy Licensing

Pirate Radio Stations

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on recent raids on pirate radio stations; and if he will list all those radio stations raided;

(2) how many pirate radio stations are operating within the United Kingdom; how many are operating offshore or otherwise outside the United Kingdom; and if he will list them.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Community (Own Resources)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the recent EEC Foreign Affairs Council discussed the text of the new own resources decision; and what are the outstanding points still to be agreed.

Mr. Luce: This item was on the agenda as part of the process of implementing the Fontainebleau conclusions and so that the Council could discuss how to cover the financing requirements already established in the 1985 budget. The outstanding points relate to the mechanisms to be used to meet the Community's inescapable financial obligations, and to the timing of the entry into force of the new own resources decision.

Cash Limits

Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any changes have occurred in his Department's cash limits for 1984-85 since 31 July 1984.

Mr. Renton: The cash limit for Class II, Vote I, "Overseas Representation, Diplomatic, Consular and other Foreign and Commonwealth Services," will be increased by £820,000 from £373,968,000 to £374,788,000. The extra money is required to compensate for the effects in 1984-85 of increases in overseas inflation and adverse exchange rate movements.

The cash limit for Class II, Vote 4, the British Council, will be increased by £1,430,000 from £46,021,000 to £47,451,000. The increase represents that portion of overseas risen costs not covered in the cash limited provision announced on 31 July which falls to be financed by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Diplomatic Wing).

A Supplementary Estimate is also being submitted to cover the increased expenditure on the non-cash limited Class II, Vote 2, £5,500,000 which is required as a result of movements in exchange rates.

All the increases will be charged to the Reserve and are subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Walking Aids

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the average intervals between (a) the application of the appropriate National Health Service worker for a walking aid for a patient and the approval of such application and (b) between the approval and the supply of the aid; and to what extent these periods have increased in the last two years or similar convenient period.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman is aware of any specific problems in this field, perhaps he will let me have details which I shall have investigated.

Hotels

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new hotels, of 30 bedrooms or more, received grant support in Northern Ireland in each of the three years ended 31 December 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Dr. Boyson: None, but grant aid has been approved for the construction of three new hotels in this category.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

SCOTLAND

Surveys and Valuations

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to complete consideration of the report of the expert committee on multiple surveys and valuations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: I received a copy of the committee's report at the end of November and the Government are giving consideration to those recommendations which are addressed to them and will respond in due course. Many of the recommendations relate to matters outside the Government's direct responsibilities and fall to be considered by the various professional bodies and institutions concerned.

Administration Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total cost of the administration of his Department, expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger: The total cost of administration of the Scottish Office expressed in 1983-84 prices in the last five years was as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	112·8
1980-81	114·8
1981-82	113·6
1982-83	111·8
1983-84	110·8

This information excludes the costs of the State hospital, the Scottish prison service and the Royal Scottish museum.

Government Expenditure

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will break down expenditure in Scotland outlined in Cmnd. 9428, table 3.15, in the same way as tables 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11 and 3.13 in the same publication.

Mr. Younger: The information requested will be given for each of the programmes within my responsibility in "Public Expenditure to 1987-88: A Commentary on the Scotland Programme", which will be published shortly. I shall arrange for copies to be deposited in the Library, and for a copy to be sent to the hon. Gentleman and to other right hon. and hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Younger: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Greater Glasgow Health Board (Projects)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will make a decision on the capital projects at present being considered by the Greater Glasgow health board, especially in respect of the maintenance, improvement and modernisation of the staff houses at Woodilee and Stonyetts hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: The special allocation to boards for the improvement of building stock will be announced along with the full allocation for boards for 1985-86 before the end of the current financial year. It will be for Greater Glasgow health board to decide how much to allocate towards the maintenance, improvement and modernisation of staff houses.

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Servants (Sickness Absence)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister for the Civil Service what is the absence rate caused by illness in the Civil Service, distinguishing between non-industrial and industrial staff; and what have been the trends in these figures in the past five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: Sickness absence rates for the five years from 1977 to 1981 inclusive were analysed following a written question from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on 6 April 1982 at column 288. An updated version of those figures is as follows. Analysis of the data for the five-year period up to and including 1983 is being made, and my right hon. and noble Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will write to the hon. Member on the subject.

* The percentages for each year have been calculated on the population at risk during the year. 1979 figures are given for illustrative purposes.
† Absenteeism—unauthorised absence—is not recorded in most departments because any unexplained absence is investigated and is ultimately classed as annual, sick or special leave. Strikes make up the biggest component in the figures provided.

EMPLOYMENT

Mode A Youth Training

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion and number of locally-approved mode A youth training places are organised by private training agencies for the areas covered by the following area manpower boards: (a) Birmingham and Solihull, (b) Greater Manchester, (c) Coventry and Warwickshire, (d) London north, (e) London north-east, (f) London south-east and (g) London south-west.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is in the following table. The figures relate to the situation at the end of December 1984.

Area	Total contracted Mode A places	Contracted places private training agencies	Private training places of total Mode A
			Per cent.
Birmingham	7,425	2,593	34·9
Greater Manchester	11,809	2,517	21·3
Coventry and Warwickshire	3,807	1,447	38·0
London North	2,762	800	29·0
London North East	4,089	1,131	27·7
London South East	3,514	1,770	50·4
London South and West	3,370	80	2·4

Faulty Electrical Apparatus

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were (a) injured and (b) killed at places of work as a result of faulty electrical plugs, sockets and switches during 1982, 1983 and 1984; which were caused by fires; and which were from other causes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest available information is as follows:

Injuries reported to HSE inspectorates in which faulty electrical plugs, sockets or switches were identified*

	1982	1983
Persons killed	7	9
Major injuries (excluding HM Factory Inspectorate for which data not available)	1	1

* Excludes injuries reported to local authorities.

None of the injuries was caused by fire.

In 1982, 819 injuries involving more than three days' absence from work, due to any kind of exposure to, or contact with, electrical current, were reported to all authorities enforcing the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. Of these, 41 were caused by fires or explosions. The figures for 1983 are 455 and 15, respectively, reflecting changed reporting arrangements. The numbers of these involving faulty electrical plugs, sockets or switches could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Wages Councils

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has figures to indicate whether geographical areas are particularly problematic for wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The level of compliance with wages council orders varies between wages inspectorate divisions. Although no division is particularly problematic, the figures indicate that compliance in the Wales, north-west (west) and northern divisions tends to be not as high as in other divisions.

Hairdressers (Wages)

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has from wages council figures about the extent of underpaying in hairdressing salons.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In 1983, the pay of 13,031 workers in 3,925 hairdressing establishments was checked by inspectors. A total of 1,110 workers—8·5 per cent. —were found to be underpaid and arrears of £125,182 were assessed.

Warehouse Fire (Sheffield)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any information on the number of people downwind whose health was affected by asbestos or chemicals or in any other way as a result of the fire on 14 December at a warehouse in Sheffield.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This Department does not hold this information. The after effects of the fire were dealt with by the local environmental health departments.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence he has about trends in the employment prospects of groups with above average earnings and of the effect on their employment prospects of salary increases above the rate of inflation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is no specific evidence on the part that the cost of labour has played in determining the employment prospects of groups with above average earnings. However, there is general evidence, too, that these prospects would be enhanced if the cost of labour fell in real terms. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) on 22 October 1984, at column 481, and the recent publication by the Treasury, "The relationship between employment and wages", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Youth Training Schemes (Waltham Forest)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of youth training scheme entrants in the London borough of Waltham Forest in 1984 and in 1985 were from the ethnic minorities.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Of the 618 entrants to the youth training scheme in the London borough of Waltham Forest in 1984, 194 were from ethnic minorities. So far in 1985, 16 young people have entered the youth training scheme, of whom one was from the ethnic minorities.

Unit Labour Costs

Mr. Williams asked the Secretary of State for Employment how unit labour costs in Britain have compared with those in principal competitor countries in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Annual percentage changes in unit labour costs in national currencies in manufacturing for principal competitor countries from 1969 to 1982 are given in table 9.10 of "Historical Statistics, 1960-1982", published by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development—OECD. Later figures are given in table 21 of the OECD "Economic Outlook", Number 36. These publications are available in the Library.

Redundancy Payments

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list Her Majesty's Government's contribution towards redundancy payments in each financial year since 1979-80.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Expenditure from the redundancy fund on rebates to employers and payments direct to employees in the years referred to was as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	112·8
1980-81	278·1
1981-82	420·6
1982-83	381·8
1983-84	378·1

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Skillcentre, Perivale

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future of the Perivale skillcentre.

Mr. Peter Morrison: At its meeting on 24 January the Manpower Services Commission considered and endorsed proposals from its skillcentre training agency for the future of skillcentre services. The chairman has written to my right hon. Friend with the commission's views—a copy of his letter is in the Library—and we are considering its advice. The proposals envisage that the skillcentre at Perivale would be retained and provide expanded training services for both employed and unemployed people in line with our adult training strategy.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University of Oxford (Grants)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what grants were made from public funds to the University of Oxford in the five years to May 1979 and in the latest five year period since then, expressed in real and money terms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Recurrent and capital grants made available to the University of Oxford, in the five financial years 1974-75 to 1978-79 and in the latest five financial years since then, on the advice of the University Grants Committee and the Computer Board, were as follows:

Financial Year	Cash £	Cost* £
1974-75	17,039,457	51,749,194
1975-76	22,624,277	54,684,997
1976-77	24,031,274	51,306,121
1977-78	21,471,621	40,272,378
1978-79	23,797,363	40,412,599
1979-80	27,475,999	39,912,260
1980-81	35,372,724	43,322,381
1981-82	36,580,111	40,735,090
1982-83	42,409,237	44,281,457
1983-84	†46,209,816	46,209,816

* Cash figures, deflated to a 1983-84 base, using GDP deflators which provide an estimate of the average movement of prices across the economy as a whole.

† Includes £112,785 for redundancy and restructuring costs.

The figures are not comparable from year to year because of various funding changes, most notably because of adjustments made to reflect changes in the level of the home university undergraduate tuition fee which for most students is paid from public funds. For example, the real value of this fee was more than doubled for the 1977-78 academic year, approximately halved for the 1982-83 academic year and further reduced for 1983-84. In all these cases there were compensating adjustments in UGC recurrent grant which prevent valid comparisons between years.

Individual Oxford Colleges also receive income from College fees which for most students are paid from public funds as part of the student award. These cover some of the costs which for other universities are met through UGC recurrent grant.

Universities (Grants)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what grants were made to universities from public funds in each year since 1974 expressed in real money terms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Recurrent and capital grants made available to universities in Great Britain in each financial year since 1974-75 on the advice of the University Grants Committee and the Computer Board, were as follows:

Financial Year	Cash £	Cost* £
1974-75	488,714,386	1,484,235,995
1975-76	610,814,409	1,476,395,652
1976-77	692,938,013	1,479,403,943
1977-78	622,003,229	1,166,635,211
1978-79	691,903,606	1,174,988,293
1979-80	842,460,288	1,223,776,947
1980-81	1,067,061,671	1,306,872,836
1981-82	1,098,643,005	1,223,433,190
1982-83	†1,312,258,944	1,370,190,603
1983-84	†1,357,795,954	1,357,795,954

* Cash figures adjusted to a 1983-84 base, using GDP deflators which provide an estimate of the average movement of prices across the country as a whole.

† Includes redundancy and restructuring costs — £57,000,000 in 1982-83 and £38,800,000 in 1983-84.

These figures are not comparable from year to year because of various funding charges, most notably because of adjustments made to reflect changes in the level of the home undergraduate tuition fee which for most students is paid from public funds. For example, the real value of this fee was more than doubled for the 1977-78 academic year, approximately halved for the 1982-83 academic year and further reduced for 1983-84. In all these cases there were compensating adjustments in UGC recurrent grant which prevent valid comparisons between years.

Individual Oxford Colleges also receive income from college fees which for most students are paid from public funds as part of the student award. These cover some of the costs which for other universities are met through UGC recurrent grant.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those local authorities in England and Wales which have reserve powers to override school governing bodies in relation to corporal punishment policy.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not have comprehensive information on the existence of such powers which would be assigned in the articles of government for each school, made in most cases by the maintaining local education authority.

Nursery Schools

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many new nursery schools have been constructed since 1979; and if he will list these area by area.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend approved particulars of major building projects for one new nursery school in 1983-84 and three in 1984-85. The areas were Derbyshire (two), Salford and Waltham Forest.

Primary Schools

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children under the age of five years have been admitted to primary school education during the last four years.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not available centrally in the form requested. However, the number of pupils aged under five years in infant classes in maintained primary schools in England in January 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 were 206,507, 201,279, 210,372 and 236,417 respectively.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department does not collect comprehensive information on fees and charges for services rendered by the wide range of bodies which it grant aids. Services costing over £100,000 which the Department and certain non-departmental public bodies for which it is responsible are required to report annually to the Treasury were as follows in 1983-84:—

(a) No fee charged—nil

(b) Fee not fully covering cost of service

Agricultural and Food Research Council: sugar beet research services.

(c) Fee exactly covering cost of service

DES: Accommodation and general services provided for the Further Education Unit.

Agricultural and Food Research Council: research and statistical services.

National Environment Research Council: research services contracts.

Science and Engineering Research Council: computing and research.

British Museaum (Natural History): publications/ bookshop.

(d) Fee more than covering cost of service—nil

NATIONAL FINANCE

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out in league table form, for the year 1983-84 for all European Economic Community countries, the United States of America, Canada and Sweden (a) the total gross domestic product in each country and (b) gross domestic product per head in each country.

Mr. Peter Rees: The tables show the requested values for the calendar year 1983. They are calculated by OECD and use purchasing power parities rather than market exchange rates to put national currency estimates on to a common basis.

(a) Comparison by gross domestic product, 1983 using purchasing power parities

1.	United States	100·0
2.	Germany	21·0
3.	France	18·0
4.	United Kingdom	16·5
5.	Italy	15·0
6.	Canada	10·0
7.	Netherlands	4·5
8.	Belgium	3·5
9.	Denmark	2·0
10.	Greece	1·5
11.	Ireland	0·5
12.	Luxembourg	0·1

(b) Comparison by gross domestic product per head, 1983 using purchasing power parities

1.	United States	100·0
2.	Canada	95·0
3.	Denmark	82·0
4.	Luxembourg	81·0
5.	Germany	80·0
6.	France	79·0
7.	Belgium	78·0
8.	Netherlands	72·0
9.	United Kingdom	69·0
10.	Italy	61·0
11.	Ireland	49·0
12.	Greece	40·0

Source: OECD.

Note: Comparable data (using purchasing power parities) are not available for Sweden. Comparisons using exchange rates are available for all countries listed in OECD Main Economic Indicators (Appendix) January 1985, but because of exchange rate fluctuations they may be misleading.

Community Reform

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the reply of 23 January, Official Report, column 978, if he will explain by what means the agreement on European Economic Community budget discipline will ensure that agriculture will progressively represent a smaller share of the total Community budget.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 29 January at columns 102-3.

Taxation

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all forms of taxation in rank order by the collection cost of each, with the least expensive to collect first.

Mr. Moore: The information requested is as follows. Column (a) gives the absolute cost of collecting each tax. Column (b) gives the cost as a percentage of the yield for each tax.

Cost of collection 1983-84	(a) £ million	(b) Cost as a percentage of yield
Matches/Mechanical lighters	0·2	1·1
Petroleum revenue tax/ supplementary petroleum duty	0·7	0·01
Car Tax	1·8	0·3

Pensions (Taxation)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the Manchester chamber of commerce and Industry about the tax treatment of pension contributions and tax-free lump sum commutation benefits on retirement; what reply he is sending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: I have received a considerable number of representations on this subject. As these are treated in confidence, I cannot comment on any individual case; and I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that it is not the practice to comment on speculation about a forthcoming Budget.

Departmental Facility Agreements

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) of 17 January, Official Report, columns 187-8, what are the differences in the departmental facility agreements which lead to the sharply differing cost of those agreements as a percentage of the departmental wages bill.

Mr. Hayhoe: The national agreement on facilities provides the framework for departmental facilities agreements, not all of which were fully operational at the time of the last costings review. This factor, together with the varying levels of union membership, staff representation and consultative machinery within Departments, together with the varying number of sites involved, account for the differences in the cost of facilities expressed as a percentage of departmental wage bills. My officials are reviewing with Departments the effectiveness of the 1982 national agreement with the objective of achieving the maximum possible degree of consistency by bringing these where the costs are highest more in line with the rest.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Child Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) to what amount per week child benefit could be raised if it were taxed and the proceeds of taxation allocated to raising its levels;

(2) to what level per week child benefit could be raised if the married man's tax allowance were reduced to the rate of a single man's for men below retirement age and the savings allocated to raising the levels of child benefit;

(3) to what level per week child benefit could be raised if both (a) it were taxed and the proceeds of taxation were allocated to raising its level and (b) the married man's tax allowance were reduced to the rate of a single man's for men below retirement age and the savings allocated to raising the levels of child benefits.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Pension Funds

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what information he has as to (a) the absolute value and (b) the percentage share of (i) private sector, (ii) local authority and (iii) other public sector pensions funds in total pension funds in 1983 and 1984;

(2) what information he has as to the aggregate assets of pension funds in 1957, 1967, 1977, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Quoted Shares (Ownership)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has to the share of (a) trust companies, (b) insurance companies and (c) pension funds in the ownership of total quoted shares in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

Research and Development

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what amount his Department spent on research and development, respectively, for military weapons in the latest year for which figures are available; how many United Kingdom firms benefit directly from this expenditure; and if he will list those firms which received more than £100 million for those purposes.

Mr. Butler: In 1983-84 £357 million was spent on research and £1,556 million on development. A more detailed analysis of research and development figures is given each year in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates, Volume 2." It is not possible without undue cost and effort to identify all firms which benefit directly from defence research and development expenditure, but the number of firms with defence research and development contracts in 1983-84 was about 1,100 and of these British Aerospace (Aircraft) and British Aerospace (Dynamics) each received more than £100 million in defence contracts for research and development purposes.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the defence budget is spent on research and development; what are the comparable figures for West Germany and France; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: In 1983-84, 12·4 per cent. of the defence budget was spent on research and development. Comparable figures for West Germany and France are not available.

Nuclear Capability

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence how he intends to maintain the effectiveness of the United Kingdom nuclear capability in the event of the conclusion of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Butler: This is a hypothetical question; but I would remind the hon. Gentleman that effective verification must be at the heart of any such treaty.

Departmental Administration (Cost)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total cost of the administration of his Department, expressed in constant prices, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Butler: The following figures are derived from a new assessment of the Department's running costs, based on the final statement of outturn, which covered only the last three financial years:

	£ million (1983-84 prices throughout)
1981-82	6,316
1982-83	6,215
1983-84	6,130

These figures are significantly lower than the figures which were given to my hon. Friend in a written answer on 26 January 1984, at column 691, mainly because they exclude capital expenditure and notional expenditure such as pension costs. In order to provide a consistent basis for comparison, they also exclude Falklands-related expenditure—in 1982-83 and 1983-84—and payments made under the Property Repayment Services arrangements which were introduced on 1 April 1983.

The figures cover a much wider range of activities than those normally associated with the administration of a Department of state and include the pay and other costs of all service personnel and civilian staff. Consequently, they are not strictly comparable with the administrative costs of other Departments.

Christmas Island (Nuclear Tests)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in carrying out the survey using service and national cancer registry records, in relation to the atmospheric nuclear tests at Christmas Island in the 1950s

Mr. Butler: I understand that the study being undertaken by the National Radiological Protection Board is progressing to plan, and it is expected that it will be completed by about October 1986.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Butler: The Ministry of Defence has responsibility for 18 non-departmental public bodies, of which 14 are purely advisory bodies receiving money only to cover members' expenses. The remaining four are International Military Services and the Services Sound and Vision Corporation which are limited companies, the National Army museum and the Royal Air Force museum. In addition, the Secretary of State for Defence is the sole shareholder of the Royal Ordnance plc. The MOD also has responsibilities for the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations, Greenwich hospital and Travers estates, and the Royal hospital, Chelsea, which are all

Crown bodies, and for the NAAFI, the Royal Naval Film Corporation and the Services' Sports Control Boards and cadet organisations. A list of the non-governmental organisations in receipt of grants-in-aid from the MOD is given in section 1K of the Supply Estimates, Class 1 (Defence). The MOD also subscribes to international organisations such as NATO.

The MOD provides the general public and private organisations with a wide range of services — for example, search and rescue, meteorological and hydrographic information and sports and recreational facilities. A comprehensive list of these services is not available and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

As a general rule, charges are set to recover cost. However, many of the services utilise spare capacity and the charge then reflects marginal rather than full cost. Charges may also sometimes be waived or set below cost — for example, for military assistance where there is immediate danger to life, for services provided under reciprocal arrangements, and for services provided where significant publicity, recruiting, training or other defence benefits accrue to the MOD.

Towed Arrays

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the use of towed arrays in the Royal Navy.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 344]: The towed arrays sonar is in use in the Royal Navy in both submarines and surface ships. It facilitates the passive detection of other ships and submarines from their noise emissions.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Pensions and Benefits

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will compare retirement and other state pensions and all other welfare and national insurance benefits and allowances paid in 1979 with those paid at the end of 1983 and 1984, showing each of the 1984 payments as a percentage of the 1979 payments.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is in the table.

National Insurance

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate what national insurance contributions would have to be levied to maintain the same income to the fund if the Treasury supplement to the national insurance fund were now at (a) 18 per cent. and (b) 15 per cent.

Mr. Whitney: The Government Actuary calculates that in order to maintain the same income to the national insurance fund the total class I contribution rate could be reduced by (a) 1·05 percentage points and (b) 0·6 percentage points if the Treasury supplement were increased to 18 per cent. and 16 per cent. respectively. In each case it is assumed that there would be similar revisions to the other contribution rates. The other assumptions underlying the calculation are set out in the government Actuary's report on the draft of the Social Security (Contributions Rerating) (No. 2) Order 1984 (Cmnd. 9386).

Falklands Campaign (War Pensions Welfare Officers)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the level of advice being given by war pensions welfare officers to service men involved in the Falklands campaign and their families.

Mr. Whitney: Yes. However, if the hon. Member has a particular case in mind and would like to let me have the details I should be pleased to look into it.

Health Authority Employees (Removal Expenses)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what plans he has to carry out a review of the Whitley agreement covering removal expenses of health authority employees;

(2) what is the highest sum that has been paid out by a health authority in respect of removal expenses for an employee; and if he will make a statement as to the circumstances.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the costs of individual removals is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The management side of the General Whitley Council is currently reviewing the working of the agreement and has agreed that there should be a survey of a representative sample of about 40 health authorities to establish reliable estimates of cost.

Health Service and Public Health Act 1968

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those organisations that have received grants under section 64 of the Health Service and Public Health Act 1968 from his Department in respect of 1984-85, stating the amounts paid in each case.

Mr. John Patten: Under our general scheme of grants to voluntary organisations under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968, grants are approved throughout the financial year and a number of applications are currently being processed. The table gives the most recently available information about grants that have been approved for payment in 1984-85.

Children and Young Persons (Foot Abnormalities)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has current information about abnormalities of the foot among children and teenagers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We collect centrally information on the numbers of school children who receive chiropody treatment but do not have more general information about foot conditions in these age groups.

Public Social Services

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the percentage of gross domestic product devoted to the public social services in Britain in each of the past five years for which figures are available; and what was the equivalent percentage of gross domestic product for each of the United Kingdom's European Economic Community partners in each of these years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The proportion of the United Kingdom's gross domestic product devoted to expenditure on health and personal social services over the period 1979 to 1983 was:

Year	Proportion of GDP (per cent)
1979	5·8
1980	6·4
1981	6·7
1982	6·5
1983	6·7

Comparable information for other European Community countries is not readily available.

Departmental Posts

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which were the two new posts at under-secretary level and above, the two new posts at assistant secretary level and the one new post at senior principal level established between 1 April 1983 and 1 April 1984 and set out in table 3.12.12 of volume 2 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88".

Mr. Whitney: The increase shown at under-secretary level and above reflects the creation of two new posts. One is that of the director of the operational strategy for social security, leading a major development programme for the use of information technology in our operations; the second is that of the chief adjudication officer, who advises adjudication officers on the performance of their functions under the various legislative provisions of social security, supplementary benefit, child benefit and family income supplement.

At the assistant secretary and senior principal level the figures shown in the table mask higher numbers of changes, both additions and reductions, about which I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Emergency Bed Service

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the staffing levels of the emergency bed service in each single year since 1980.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect the sort of detailed information centrally which would be required to answer fully the hon. Member's question.

The hon. Member may wish to seek further information from the chairman of the Lewisham and North Southwark health authority, to whose authority the day-to-day running of the service has been delegated.

Cot Deaths

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of cot deaths in 1984 occurred within families living in rural areas.

Mr. John Patten: Figures for the full year 1984 are not yet available. Of the 956 deaths in the first three quarters of 1984 with mention of cot death or similar term on the death certificate, 93 (9·7 per cent.) were usually resident in the 78 county districts which were classified in the 1981 census preliminary report as "Remoter largely rural, districts". These districts contain approximately 10 per cent. of the population of England and Wales.

Prescription Charges

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the rates at which prescription charges have been increased in each single year since June 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information is as follows:

Prescription charges

Date/Year	Level of charge Pence	Rate of increase Per cent.
Before June 1979	20	—
16 July 1979	45	125
1 April 1980	70	122
1 December 1980	100
1 April 1981	100	0
1 April 1982	130	30
1 April 1983	140	7·7
1 April 1984	160	14·3

Limited List Prescribing

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he did not consult the presidents of the medical royal colleges before making his proposals for the limited list of drugs prescribable within the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Over the last two years there has been a large amount of debate involving the Government and members and representative of the medical profession on the subject of containing drug costs, and the profession's views are well known. I do not see that further private consultations before we announced the beginning of public consultation would have served any useful purpose. We have of course now been consulting with the medical and pharmaceutical professions about the limited list for almost three months since my right hon. Friend's announcement on 8 November 1984.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he proposes to announce the final, definitive list of medicines which will be prescribable under the National Health Service from 1 April; when he proposes to announce the final, definitive list of medicines which will not be prescribable under the National Health Service from the same date; and whether he intends to publish on the same dates the criteria by which both prescribable and non-prescribable medicines have been selected for inclusion in those lists.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We will make a comprehensive announcement as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of proprietary medicines dispensed to people on free National Health Service prescriptions he expects will be sold across the counter as a result of his limited list proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is our intention that the drugs on the final list should meet all clinical needs. While some patients may prefer to buy a favourite brand name drug, we have made no estimate of their potential numbers.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he regulates existing limited lists for prescribing in hospital.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. Where they exist hospital formularies are drawn up locally, usually by local drug and therapeutic committees.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has had about the availability of laxatives under the National Health Service sufficient to provide relief in all cases of constipation, following the introduction of his proposed limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received a number of comments about the laxatives to remain available on National Health Service prescription under our limited list proposals. We are considering them all carefully. I can assure my hon. Friend that it is our intention that an adequate range of laxatives should continue to be prescribable under the National Health Service.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provides services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Child Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he has given to the possibility of introducing differential rates of child benefit using the same age bands and benefit ratios as for supplementary benefit children's scale rates.

Mr. Whitney: The social security review has considered a wide range of options, including the possibility of introducing differential rates of child benefit. We hope to be in a position to announce the conclusions of this review in the course of the next few months.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what savings would ensue if differential rates of child benefit were introduced using the same age bands and benefits ratios as for supplementary benefit children's scale rates.

Mr. Whitney: The savings would depend upon the levels of benefit chosen.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has recently recieved advocating the introduction of differential rates of child benefit using the same age bands and benefit ratios as for supplementary benefit children's scale rates.

Mr. Whitney: In those precise terms, none.

Highgate Offices (Private Security Firms)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he proposes to use private security firms at his Department's Highgate office.

Mr. Whitney: There are no plans to use private security firms at the Department's Highgate office.

Special Claims Control Unit

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of the special claims control unit fraud investigation at his Department's Highgate office in 1984; how many claimants were visited and over what period; how many repeat visits were made and over what period; how many claimants investigated were taken off benefit or had their benefit reduced; what was the amount of benefit per week this saved; and how many of the people taken off benefit successfully reclaimed benefit in 1984 and in what period.

Mr. Whitney: The one exercise carried out by a specialist claims control team at the Highgate office in 1984 took place between 28 May and 6 July. During this period 55 current claims were examined and as a result 16 claimants stopped receiving benefit and two others had the amount of their benefit reduced. The total amount of benefit per week saved was £1,084·91, which in a full year would total £56,415. Only one of the claimants whose benefit was ceased or reduced made a repeat claim in 1984 and that was made on 14 September. The cost of the exercise was £5,400.

Hospital and Community Medicine Services (Greater London)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what effects the recently announced allocation of funds to National Health Service regions is expected to have on the hospital and community medicine services in Greater London.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have increased the cash available for running hospital and community health services in England by £500 million for 1985-86; an increase of 5½ per cent. which is a clear 1 per cent. above forecast inflation. Allocations have been made to regional health authorities broadly on the basis of the recommendations of the Resource Allocation Working Party designed to secure a fairer distribution of National Health Service resources. The Thames regions, currently funded at above average levels, will accordingly receive a smaller increase, slightly less than forecast inflation. We do not envisage any reduction of health service activity in London arising from this. All regions have major cost improvement programmes which in the case of London should release sufficient resources to fund some growth and development of priority services.

Addenbrooke's Hospital, Cambridge

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the effects of privatisation on standards of cleanliness at Addenbrooke's hospital, Cambridge.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Domestic cleaning services have been provided by private contractors at Addenbrooke's hospital, Hills road, since 1961. I understand that the Cambridge health authority is carefully monitoring the current contract to ensure satisfactory standards of cleanliness.

Monroe Devis Maternity Home, Warwickshire

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the financial grounds on which the closure of the Monroe Devis maternity home in Warwickshire can be initiated;

(2) whether he will bear in mind the effects of the indefinite suspension of the plans to build phase II of the district general hospital at Warwick when considering the proposed closure of the Monroe Devis maternity home;

(3) what consideration has been given to the adequacy of Gay block at Warneford hospital, Leamington Spa, as the sole future maternity unit for the district should the Monroe Devis maternity home be closed;

(4) whether in view of the proposed closure of the Monroe Devis maternity home, an extension of the ambulance service in Warwickshire has been considered or costed.

Mr. John Patten: South Warwickshire health authority's proposals for transfer of maternity services from the Monroe Devis maternity home were estimated to produce a recurring annual saving of £180,000 for development of services for the mentally handicapped and the mentally ill. The proposals have come to the Department for decision because the Community Health Council opposed them. In reaching a decision we shall give very careful consideration to the adequacy and accessibility of the services proposed following closure of the home.

Pay Beds

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library documents setting out the formulae and the figures used to calculate the present pay bed charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall arrange for a note setting out the method of calculation with illustrative figures to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to his answer of 21 January, Official Report, column 342, whether the long-run marginal costs of treating patients in hospitals with pay beds are estimated to be below, above or equal to the long-run average cost; and if he will quantify any difference;

(2) if he will quantify the estimated difference between the long-run marginal cost and the short-run marginal cost of treating patients in hospitals with pay beds;

(3) if he will quantify the difference between the estimated long-run marginal cost and the estimated short-run average cost of treating patients in hospitals with pay beds;

(4) whether the calculation of the estimated long-run marginal cost of treating patients assumes that the National Health Service is free to substitute fixed for variable costs and vice-versa.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am afraid that the answer I gave on 21 January at column 342 referred in error to "long run marginal costs" instead of "long run average costs". Long run marginal costs could be of relevance only in relation to a change in the level of services and have no part therefore in the process of setting private patient charges. I apologise for the error.

The information sought is neither available nor meaningful.

Departmental Offices, Melton Street, NW1

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the number of times his Department's office at 1 Melton street, London NW1, has been closed to the public.

Mr. Whitney: The office has been closed to the public on five separate occasions since 27 September 1984 because of a number of electrical failures and problems with the newly installed boiler system. The Property Services Agency, which is responsible for the maintenance of such equipment, is urgently investigating the causes of the problem.

Information and Statistics

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he does not collect information on information and statistics known to be collected by regional health authorities;

(2) whether he will list in the Official Report the statistics and information he requires regional health authorities to collect but which are not made available centrally.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

General Practitioner (Dispensing)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will introduce amendments to the regulations applying to general practitioner dispensing so as to permit general practitioners to sell medicines that will no longer be available on National Health Service prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Handicapped Children

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make available the report of his Department's social work service on services for handicapped children.

Mr. Newton: I have placed in the Library copies of a recent report on services for handicapped children by the social work service of DHSS. The report is also being made available to directors of social services and to appropriate statutory and voluntary bodies. It provides an authoritative view of contemporary social services for handicapped children, and should prove to be of value to directors by providing information which they can use to appraise their own services.

The report reflects the need for policies and systems which consider the handicapped child first of all as a child but also provide social services, often in collaboration with other agencies, appropriate to the particular handicap and handicaps. Its recommendations are designed to assist local authorities to remedy known deficiencies by making more cost-effective use of the resources available. Many are directed towards improvements in assessment, review and collaborative arrangements.

Dentists

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will show, for the year 1979 and for the most recent year available (i) the total number of dentists employed by, or under contract to, the National Health Service, (ii) the average income of a dentist under contract to the National Health Service, both in money and real terms and (iii) the total cost to the National Health Service of dentistry in money and real terms.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1985, c. 360]: The information is as follows (all figures are for England, except where indicated).

*Total number of dentists employed by or under contract to the NHS

	Number
1979	15,226
1983	16,773

* To reduce duplication, these figures exclude hospital practitioners, part-time hospital dental officers, occasional sessional staff in the community dental service and locum appointments. Figures relate to 30 September in each year.

*Average gross income of a dentist under contract to the NHS

1979-80 cash	28,374
1979-80†	41,165
1983-84 cash	43,187

* Gross income includes reimbursement of average practice expenses. Figures are for England and Wales and exclude the earnings of dentists who did not work for the whole year and a small number in other groups.
† At 1983-84 prices.

Cost to the NHS of dentistry net of income from General Dental Service patients' charges*

	£ million
1979-80 cash	314·139
1979-80†	455·753
1983-84 cash	506·946

* Excluding the costs of the Dental Estimates Board and family practitioner committees, the costs of dental staff employed by health authorities on administrative duties and, for the hospital and community services, current expenditure on accommodation, heating, lighting and support services generally and all capital expenditure.
† At 1983-84 prices.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many men, and how many women are currently living in his Department's reception centres; and if he will give comparable figures for each year since 1974.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 29 January 1985, c. 166]: On 30 November 1984, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 1,528 men and 50 women living in the Department's resettlement units (formerly reception centres). Comparable figures for previous years are:

	Men	Women
1983*	1,634	43
1982	1,818	30
1981	1,700	21
1980	2,088	56
1979	1,695	40

* The figures quoted for 1983 are an average for the month of November.

No figures are available for the period 1974 to 1978.

ENERGY

Home Insulation

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the advertising budget for 1984-85 will be specifically allocated to the homes insulation schemes.

Mr. David Hunt: There is no specific allocation within the Energy Efficiency Office's advertising budget for publicity for the homes insulation schemes which are administered by the Department of the Environment and the Scottish and Welsh Offices.

However, approximately £100,000 has so far been spent in 1984-85 publicising the schemes in advertisements, supporting leaflets and other material produced by the Energy Efficiency Office.

CEGB (Oil Costs)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the cost of oil to the Central Electricity Generating Board for each year since 1972-73 and the cost in the current financial year to date.

Mr. Goodlad: The purchase of fuel for generation is a matter for the CEGB.

Electricity Supplies

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Islington, North on 28 January, Official Report, column 11, if he will now list (a) the length and incidence of all voltage reductions since 1 March 1984 in electricity supply and (b) the comparative figures for each year since 1972.

Mr. Goodlad: I understand from the chairman of the CEGB that, as my right hon. Friend indicated on 28 January, there has been one voltage reduction since 1 March 1984 which lasted for 31 minutes. I am advised that the average number of voltage reductions from 1972-73 to date (excluding the miners' dispute in 1973-74) is 3·08 per year. The cumulative length of these reductions amounts to some 117 hours. The day-to-day operation of the integrated generation and transmission system is a matter for the CEGB.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all the nationalised industries non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Peter Walker: I am responsible for four nationalised industries (National Coal Board, electricity supply industry, British Gas Corporation and British National Oil Corporation) and one non-departmental public body (the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority). In addition, my Department from time to time makes small grant-in-aid payments to bodies such as the British National Committee of the World Energy Conference and the Petroleum Law Education Trust. I have written to the chairmen of the nationalised industries which I sponsor and the chairman of the UKAEA asking them to reply in respect of their organisations.

My Department provides the following services:

(i) Gas meter testing (including disputed meter testing);
(ii) Electricity meter testing;
(iii) Government oil pipeline and storage system (spare capacity in this system, which was constructed for defence purposes, is utilised for commercal throughputs: BNOC manages this activity on behalf of the Department).

The Department aims to recover at least the full cost of all three services listed above.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners have now returned to work since the miners' dispute began; and what is that figure as a percentage of the numbers employed in the mining industry.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that since the start of the dispute over 36,000 ex-strikers have returned to work. There are now over 82,000 NUM members not on strike, which is 44 per cent. of the 187,300 NUM members employed in the industry.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many pits are now operating; what is their combined output of coal per day; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that 79 pits are now producing coal. Only 11 of the board's 174 pits have no men working at all. The latest published figures show that in November deep-mined production was 2·3 million tonnes.

ENVIRONMENT

Rate Capping

7. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the assumptions on balances made by him prior to determining the provisional maximum rates for the 18 authorities designated under the Rates Act 1984.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I am prepared to discuss how I arrived at my proposed rate or precept limits in the context of discussions with individual authorities on possible alternative limits.

33. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his timetable of further parliamentary action in respect of those authorities designated under the Rates Act.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The draft order setting precept limits for the four precepting authorities which I laid before the House on 30 January will be debated later today. My present intention is shortly to lay before the House a draft order setting rate limits for those designated rating authorities which have not agreed to their proposed rate limit.

Water Authorities

11. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the salaries of the chairmen and chief executives of the regional water authorities.

Mr. Gow: Regional water authority chairmen all work on a part-time basis. Their notional salaries range from £34,650 to £42,000; their actual salaries range from £17,325 to £33,600. Chief executives are full-time, and their salaries range from £34,242 to £39,304. With permission, I shall circulate the details in the Official Report.

Salary levels of Water Authority Chairmen and Chief Executives

Authority	Chairman Full-time equivalent	Actual	Chief Executive
North West	42,000	33,600	39,300
Severn Trent	42,000	33,600	39,304
Thames	42,000	33,600	—*
Anglian	37,275	29,820	36,775
Southern	37,275	26,093	36,775
Yorkshire	37,275	26,093	—*
Northumbrian	34,650	17,325	34,242
South West	34,650	24,255	34,242
Wessex	34,650	20,790	34,242

* There is no chief executive post in these authorities.

Housing Statistics

16. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses were completed in 1984 in the private and public sectors.

Sir. George Young: During 1984, about 131,000 private sector and 42,000 public sector dwellings were completed in England.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

18. Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many sites of special scientific interest there were in England at the latest available date.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that as at 31 December 1984 there were 2,779 sites of special scientific interest in England.

Water Charges

19. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what average increase in charges by water authorities he expects for 1985-86.

Mr. Gow: A little over 10 per cent.

23. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the likely increase in water charges to domestic consumers in each of the next three years as a result of Government financial targets.

Mr. Gow: A little over 10 per cent. in 1985-86; above the rate of inflation in the two following years.

Borough of Brent (Labour Party Document)

20. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which a document belonging to the Brent Labour Group concerning the recent meeting of Labour party leaders of local authorities on his rate-capping list came into his hands.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I understand that police investigations are now taking place into the alleged theft of a blue exercise book from Brent town hall. It would not be appropriate therefore for me to comment at this stage.

Milk Production

21. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations have been made to him as to the possible effect on the countryside of constraints in milk production.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have received representations from various quarters expressing concern that the introduction of quotas on milk production may encourage the conversion of grazing marshes in the Broads to arable, and, in addition, have adverse implications for employment in rural areas.

Local Authority Services

22. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has undertaken with the local authority associations concerning any proposals for additional tendering for local authority services.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall be seeking the views of the local authority associations and other interested bodies very shortly.

Falkland Islands (Airport)

24. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest cost estimate for Mount Pleasant airport in the Falklands.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 30 January 1985, at column 181.

Household Survey

25. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in view of the decision not to carry out a census in 1986, he will proceed to carry out a 10 per cent. household survey for England in 1986.

Mr. Macfarlane: We are considering commissioning a large-scale household survey in England in 1986, involving about 1·5 million households. A decision will be announced in the spring.

Privatisation (Departmental Savings)

26. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the current estimated savings by his Department for 1984-85 as a result of privatisation schemes.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I estimate that privatisation and contracting out will save the Department, excluding the Property Services Agency, some £5 million in 1984-85.

In the Property Services Agency, including Crown Suppliers, some 8,800 posts have been saved since April 1979 by the transfer of work to the private sector.

Most of the work transferred has been maintenance work. In cost terms, the effect of this has been neutral.

Private Sector Housing

27. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to allow local planning authorities to lay down minimum standards for internal arrangements of private sector housing development.

Mr. Macfarlane: No.

Nuclear Electromagnetic Pulse

28. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

Sir George Young: Necessary action is taken in respect of defence equipment, which it would not be in the public interest to describe.

Endangered Species (Preservation)

Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy regarding the use by the United Kingdom of the fund established by the Council of Ministers of the European Economic Community for the preservation of the habitat of endangered species, Council regulation No. 1872/84.

Mr. Waldegrave: In am encouraging the maximum use of the grant facilities available under this regulation.

Block Grant System

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Audit Commission to discuss the Commission's report on the workings of the block grant system.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My right hon. Friend met the chairman of the Audit Commission on 10 January 1985. They discussed a wide range of issues.

Homeless People

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will identify the programmes, or parts of programmes, in the housing chapter of the public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428-II) which have as their object a reduction in the number of homeless people.

Mr. Gow: The housing programme includes provision for £3 billion of capital investment in each of the next three years. One of the aims of the programme, set out in the White Paper, is to enable local authorities, housing associations and new towns to provide accommodation for those whose needs cannot be met in the private sector. It is for each authority to decide the relative priorities of those in need, including homeless people.

Low-cost Rented Accommodation

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action his Department is taking to encourage the building of low-cost rented accommodation in the public or private sectors.

Sir George Young: The Government's public expenditure plans allow for over £3 billion of public investment in housing in 1985-86. Ministers have encouraged local authorities to concentrate their resources on those in special need. The Housing Corporation's programme for 1985-86 includes £550 million for expenditure on providing fair rent and hostel accommodation. The Government are considering whether further steps, in addition to those in the Housing Act 1980, should be taken to encourage private landlords to meet the demand for homes to rent.

Nuclear Damage

34. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what effect a 1 megaton nuclear burst at a height of 300 miles overhead would have on the equipment and resources in his charge.

Sir George Young: Apart from defence equipment, no assessment has been made of the damage which such an attack would cause.

Hythe (Industrial Plants)

35. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will set up an independent review of the information available from official sources on the effect on the environment and health of those living and working locally of the activities of Re-Chem International plc and other industrial plants in the Hythe area.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and I are not aware of any particular grounds for commissioning such a review.

Basildon District Council

36. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the efforts of Basildon district council to save money and stay within the proposed rate limitation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have no detailed information. It is for the council to decide how to make the savings required by rate limitation in 1985-86.

Capital Allocations

37. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from local authorities in response to the capital allocations for 1985-86.

64. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards local authorities' use of their capital receipts.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: A number of representations have been made by right hon. and hon. Members, by individual local authorities and by the local authority associations. Discussions are being held with the associations as to the future of the local authority capital control system as a whole.

Leicester (Improvement Grants)

38. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what effect he expects his housing policy to have on the level of improvement grants for private property in Leicester.

Mr. Gow: It is for Leicester city council to decide how much of its housing investment programme should go towards improvement grants.

Development Commission

39. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Development Commission; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Secretary of State last met the chairman of the Development Commission in July last year. Discussions were wide-ranging, but topics included the commission's financial and manpower resources, the designation of rural development areas and the preparation of rural development programmes within these areas.

Inner Cities (Departmental Review)

40. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the conclusions of the review of the inner cities directorate of his Department; when the review will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Officials have carried out a review of urban policy and the urban programme. It is not proposed to publish this internal review, but the conclusions will be reflected in the proposals now being prepared to improve the delivery of urban policy and the management of the urban programme. These proposals will be announced shortly.

ENVIRONMENT

Gleneagles Agreement

41. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent meetings he has had with sports representatives to discuss the Gleneagles agreement.

Mr. Macfarlane: None.

70. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is considering any new initiatives to strengthen the Gleneagles agreement.

Mr. Macfarlane: No.

Anglian Water Authority

42. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Anglian water authority; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend and his ministerial colleagues are always in close touch with water authority chairmen. Most recently, I met the chairman of the Anglian water authority on 14 January 1985. Among the subjects discussed were river quality, navigation costs and income, nitrates and fluoridation.

Housing Improvement Grants

43. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish the consultation document on the development of the housing improvement grants system referred to in Cmnd. 9428.

47. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to announce the result of his review of improvement grants.

57. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish the consultative document about the future of repair and improvement grants.

Mr. Gow: I refer the hon. Members and my hon. Friend to my answer earlier today to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike).

52. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to increase the level of investment in housing improvement.

Mr. Gow: The Government's public expenditure plans allow for over £3 billion of public sector investment in housing in each of the next three years. It is for local authorities to decide, within the total of resources available to them, what proportion to devote to housing improvement. In the private sector it is primarily the responsibility of owners to keep their own houses in good repair.

Jubilee Park Gardens, Southall

44. Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the decision of Ealing borough to build dwellings across the entrance to Jubilee Park Gardens, Southall.

Mr. Macfarlane: One letter, in addition to the correspondence from, and earlier parliamentary question tabled by, the hon. Member.

Planning Permission

45. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the current state of the law regarding planning permission.

Mr. Macfarlane: We have issued a number of consultation documents about possible amendments to the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, and the necessary legislative proposals will be introduced when the parliamentary timetable permits. If my hon. Friend is concerned about problems which may have arisen over a particular proposal, I would be glad if he would write to me.

Boxing

46. Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to meet the British Boxing Board of Control to discuss the future of British boxing.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have no current plans to do so.

Local Government Reform

48. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many further representations he has received concerning his proposals relating to the future of the Greater London council and metropolitan counties since the publication of the Local Government Bill.

50. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many further representations he has received concerning his proposals relating to the future of the Greater London council and metropolitan counties since 22 November 1984.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State continues to receive a number of submissions daily.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by metropolitan county council the expected number of job losses as a result of abolition of the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have nothing to add to the estimates given in the financial memorandum to the Local Government Bill which were based on an across-the-board view of the scope for rationalisation savings arising from the removal of a tier of government, and the elimination of duplication, in all the areas concerned.

Rate Capping

49. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has had from those councils, including Leicester, since he announced their rate-capping figures.

Mr. Waldegrave: Most designated authorities have made some response to the rate or precept limits I proposed. Where relevant information has been provided it is being taken into account.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his meeting with leaders of Labour-controlled local authorities to discuss his rate-capping proposals.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: On 4 February I met councillors from 17 of the local authorities selected for rate limitation, and from nine other local authorities.

They asked me not to implement the system of targets and holdback for 1985-86; not to implement the rate limitation procedures contained in the Rates Act; to delay the timetable for debating precept limits; to put forward a detailed assessment of the impact of rate capping on local communities; to indicate the assumptions I had made in setting rate and precept limits; to restore block grant to earlier levels; and to agree to a joint commission of inquiry into local government finance.

In response I explained that, notwithstanding the failure of the 17 authorities represented to discuss the expenditure levels announced last July, and the rate limits announced on 11 December, I saw the meeting as an opportunity for individual rate-capped authorities to make representations about their proposed rate or precept limit as provided for in the Rates Act. I repeated an earlier offer to indicate, in the context of such discussions with an individual authority, the assumptions I had made in calculating their rate limit. I explained that even as such a late stage my mind was still open if any individual authority wished to make new information available to me, but that time was short in view of my duty to implement the procedures in the Rates Act within the overall rating timetable.

I pointed out that both the rate support grant report which determined the level of grant for 1985-86, and the Rates Act, had been approved by Parliament in January and that I could not go against the will of Parliament by not implementing them. I also pointed out that the target and holdback arrangements for 1985-86 had been announced in the RSG report and would already be influencing local authorities' budget-making processes. I repeated the Government's wish to abandon targets and holdbacks if possible for 1986-87.

On the proposal for a commission of inquiry, I explained that such work was already in hand, in the form of the imminent report of the National Audit Office on the block grant system and the studies of the local government finance system currently being undertaken in my Department.

Water Authorities

51. Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairmen of the regional water authorities to discuss their financial targets.

Mr. Macfarlane: The chairmen of the regional water authorities discussed their financial targets with my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction on 21 November 1984.

Construction Industry

53. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the Group of Eight to discuss the state of the construction industry.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend last met the Group of Eight in December 1983 and I met the group last July. My right hon. Friend and I will meet the group again later this month.

Rural Environment

54. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent initiatives he has taken regarding the rural environment.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle).

Rate Revaluation

55. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to begin a national rate revaluation.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Bar (Mr. Rooker), on 22 October 1984 at column 491.

Rent Controls and Security of Tenure

56. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations concerning the abolition of rent controls and security of tenure he has received.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: We continue to receive representations from various sources concerning these and other aspects of the Rent Acts.

Local Government Finance

58. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a progress report with regard to his internal departmental review of local government finance.

59. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to complete the internal studies of local government finance.

Mr. Waldegrave: The local government finance studies are at a very early stage. I do not expect them to be completed before the end of this year.

Council House Sales

60. Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council owned properties have been sold to their tenants under the provisions of the Housing Act 1980 at the latest available date; and how many of these have been flats.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 28 November 1984 at column 513.

Housing Statistics

61. Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the total housing starts for 1984; and how this compares with 1978.

Sir George Young: The figures for England appear in table 2 of the Department's housing statistics press notice released on 5 February; a copy is available in the Library.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the "Housing and Construction Statistics 1972-82" did not include up-to-date information in (a) table 11.7 (rent registration: mean registered rents and previous rents by type of accommodation) and (b) table 11.8 (rent registration: mean change on previous rent and number of cases by type of applicant); what are the figures for these tables for 1981, 1982 and 1983; and what are the figures for table 11.9 (rent registration: references to rent assessment committees) for 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Gow: In 1981 we reviewed the tables of rents which are compiled from the rents registered by rent officers. Some new tables were introduced and some were discontinued, including those of rents registered for unfurnished houses, flats and rooms—excluding housing associations and decontrolled cases—in table 11.7; and those of rent changes of applicants for first registrations of unfurnished accommodation — excluding housing associations—and of furnished accommodation in table 11.8. The tables of references to rent assessment committees are to continue and statistics up to the end of 1984 will be available shortly, when I will write to the hon. Member.

Council House Sales

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether it is Government policy that former tenants who have bought council houses and cannot keep up their mortgage payments should resell their house to the council or sell on the open market.

Sir George Young: If a former council tenant has a mortgage from the local authority and is in default, the authority may repurchase the dwelling by agreement. In other cases special consent from the Department is needed. We want to see the development of a normal market in former local authority dwellings.

Domestic Rates

62. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received against the domestic rating system during the past year.

Mr. Waldegrave: We continue to receive many representations about the domestic rating system seeking its reform or abolition.

Grant-related Expenditure

63. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his practice in future, when assessing a district council's grant related expenditure, to take into account the precepts of parish councils within its area.

Mr. Waldegrave: Parish councils have powers to provide a range of services concurrently with district councils, and to raise the necessary revenue from precepts levied on their district council. For the purpose of assessing grant related expenditure (GRE) it is assumed that the bulk of parish council expenditure relates to recreation services. A district council's recreation GRE therefore covers any spending by its constituent parish or town councils as well as its own expenditure.

Public Sector House Building

65. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will provide the number of public sector dwellings erected in 1978 and 1984, respectively.

Sir George Young: The figures for England appear in table 2 of the Department's housing statistics press notice released on 5 February. A copy is available in the Library.

Starter Units (Construction)

66. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the provision of industrial land for the construction of starter units by the Development Commission.

Sir George Young: Yes. In only a few cases has the Development Commission had to abandon intended locations for its starter units because of lack of suitable sites. There has been no unduly adverse effect on programmes as a whole.

The Development Commission look to local authorities in particular to help find possible sites. The preparation of rural development programmes will provide an incentive for the identification of further sites.

Local Authorities (Capital Expenditure)

67. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from local authority associations on the implications for the future capital expenditure of the recent severe weather conditions.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Golf Courses

68. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many golf courses have been built on common land since 1955.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am not aware of any golf courses having been built on common land since 1955.

Water Supplies (Nitrate Pollution)

69. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting on 14 January of the interdepartmental co-ordination group of experts studying the nitrate pollution of water supplies.

Mr. Waldegrave: The group had a useful meeting on 14 January. Members discussed the work of the group, the range of membership, the nitrate inputs to water, the present and future position concerning agricultural practices and water supplies, and the scope for action on both inputs and removing nitrate from water and several aspects of the problem. These discussions will be continued at subsequent meetings.

Calderdale, West Yorkshire

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the Calderdale area of West Yorkshire to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I understand that arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House to arrange for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from Monday 11 February 1985 to Friday 15 February 1985.

Lambeth

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of projects which will be funded under the inner city partnership in Lambeth in 1985-86 from his Department; and if he will indicate for each project the amount of the bid and the award of funding.

Sir George Young: The projects approved so far by the Lambeth partnership committee for 1985-86, together with their approved costs, are as follows. Where the approved cost differs from the amount sought the latter sum is shown in brackets.

Planning Appeal No. APP/Z3445/A (Report)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date he received his inspector's report in respect of planning appeal No. APP/Z3445/A which was held on 11, 12 and 13 September 1984; and when he anticipates announcing his decision.

Mr. Macfarlane: The inspector's report concerning appeal ref APP/Z3445/A/84/11678 and 18210 was received on 28 January 1985 and a decision will be issued as soon as possible.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fee, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The bodies for which my Department either has responsibility or provides funding are listed in "Public Bodies 1984" (HMSO, 1984). These bodies perform a range of functions which in some cases include services to the general public or private organisations; information concerning the level of cost recovery for specific services is not readily available in all cases but a general indication is provided in the following lists:

Public bodies providing a free service
Board of Trustees for the Armouries (museum services)
London Docklands Development Corporation (advisory services to industry)
Mersey Development Corporation (advisory services to industry)
Commons Commissioners
Local Valuation Panels
Rent Assessment Panels

Public bodies providing services for which fees are charged
British Board of Agrément
Development Commission/Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas
Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission (buildings and monuments open to the public)
Sports Council (national sports centres)

Various sections of the Department of the Environment and the Property Services Agency provide services to the general public or private organisations; current services costing over £100,000 are as follows, based on 1983-84 costs and income:

a. Services for which no fee was charged
Tenants Exchange Scheme

b. Services for which fees did not fully cover costs
Building Research Establishment: advisory and other services
Registration of captive birds
Royal palaces and royal parks
Occupied ancient monuments
Osborne House convalescent home
Cabinet War Room Exhibition (forecast deficit, War Rooms opened in April 1984)

c. Services for which fees exactly covered costs
Building Research Establishment: research work
PSA works and estates services for non-Exchequer clients

d. Services for which fees more than covered costs
Crown Suppliers

Greater London Enterprise Board

Mr. Ground asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will decline to provide financial support for the Greater London Enterprise Board unless the board either allows its business tenants in Frampton road, Hounslow, to purchase their premises or provides them with suitable alternative accommodation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall answer this question shortly.

Airport Development and Stansted (Correspondence)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the letter to the Minister for Housing and Construction on airport development and Stansted dated 24 January from the north west regional executive committee of the National Housing and Town Planning Council, together with the Minister's reply.

Mr. Gow: No. It is not our practice to publish correspondence of this kind. The right hon. Gentleman may like to approach the north-west regional executive committee of the National Housing and Town Planning Council.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 7 February 1985

ENERGY

Combined Heat and Power

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his assessment of the extra employment which could be derived from combined heat and power schemes in British cities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Energy Paper No. 53 gave estimates of the total labour input required for the installation of combined heat and power district heating in nine selected cities. From these it may be calculated that about 3,000 jobs might be created for a 12 to 15-year period by the installation of CHP-DH in all nine cities.

Plutonium Storage Ponds (Inspections)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether the Sellafield plutonium storage ponds contaning United Kingdom origin plutonium from British magnox reactors are physically inspected by International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors in connection with safeguards applied under the United Kingdom, International Atomic Energy Agency/European Atomic Energy Authority tripartite safeguards treaty.

Mr. Goodlad: No. The position on the designation of civil nuclear facilities for inspection by the International Atomic Energy Agency remains as stated in my reply of 3 December 1984 to the hon. Member.

National Coal Board

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy what assumptions have been made in relation to capital expenditure, current losses and reduction in capacity in arriving at the reduction of £1 billion in the external financing limits of the National Coal Board for 1985-86 given in Cmnd. 9428.

Mr. David Hunt: The figure for the NCB's external financing limit in 1985-86 given in Cmnd. 9428 will be reviewed after the strike. It cannot be compared directly with the forecast outturn for 1984-85 given in Cmnd. 9428.

ENVIRONMENT

Derelict Land

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce the allocation of funds for derelict land reclamation in 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The expenditure provided for derelict land reclamation in 1985-86 is £76·4 million compared with £74 million this year and only £12 million in 1974-75.

Schemes approved so far in 1984-85 will lead to the reclamation of some 1,400 hectares. About 65 per cent. of this land will be used subsequently for housing, industry or commerce. One of our main objectives is to involve the private sector in reclamation especially in towns and cities. To that end we instituted in 1982-83 a system of "category A" projects, whereby schemes where a developer is in firm prospect receive priority funding. There have, in the early years, been difficulties in bringing such schemes to fruition but DLG expenditure on new category A projects has risen from £8·3 million in 1983-84 to an anticipated £9·1 million this year. I intend to allocate up to £12 million to such schemes next year. Together with about £9 million carried forward for ongoing projects, the provision for category A schemes totals almost £21 million in 1985-86.

Money is also available for the private sector and nationalised industries to undertake reclamation on their own behalf without the involvement of the local authority. I am allocating £5 million for such schemes next year, of which about £2 million will be accounted for by projects which have already been approved.

I have allocated over £44 million to category B schemes where there is no specific developer in prospect. Of this, about half is for continuing projects, including such major schemes as those reclaiming the former Consett and Corby steelworks and Workington ironworks. The remaining £22 million is available for new starts. I have set aside almost £9 million of this for new projects in special programmes to which we have a long-standing commitment, somewhat more than last year. These include groundwork projects, which tackle dereliction in the urban fringes in the north-west, the reclamation of coal tips following the CENE report, solving the problems created by limestone subsidence in the Black Country and reclaiming derelict sites for garden festivals, in Stoke in 1986 and Gateshead in 1990. Of the remaining £13 million for new starts, at least £5 million will be spent on projects which will definitely result in private industrial or housing development, even though there is as yet no specific developer associated with the scheme. Finally, as last year there is a further special allocation of £6 million for reclamation on Merseyside.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the main policy objectives of his Department in the field of environmental protection in 1985.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our major objectives will be to maintain and improve environmental quality in the United Kingdom and, through active involvement in the relevant international bodies, to contribute to its maintenance and improvement in Europe and worldwide; and to seek scientifically based and cost-effective solutions to environmental problems. More particularly:

—to work towards further improvements in the control of atmospheric pollution, including the reduction of acidifying emissions;

—to secure a sustained improvement in river quality;

—to establish and implement a long-term improvement programme for estuarial and costal waters (including bathing waters);

—to ensure that the arrangements made for the storage and/or disposal of wastes, in particular radioactive and hazardous wastes, are satisfactory from a safety and environmental standpoint;

—to promote economy and efficiency in handling of wastes by local authorities, and to encourage recycling of wastes where appropriate;
—to ensure that progress is maintained in reducing levels of lead in the environment;
—to ensure that the practical management of the environment is supported by vigorous and relevant programme of research; and
—to promote greater provision, accessibility and understanding of data and other information about environmental protection matters.

Housing Associations

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will advise the Housing Corporation in determining grants for 1985-86 to charitable housing associations that the corporation should make an allocation of funds without taking into account the possibility of private finance for part of a project.

Sir George Young: The allocation of funds to individual housing associations within the Housing Corporation's approved development programme is a matter for the corporation. The basis of the allocation is principally an assessment of housing need.

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy and practice for the Housing Corporation on granting a second mortgage to secure its advances for the construction or conversion of new housing association buildings for the elderly leaving a first mortgage for the providers of private sector finance.

Sir George Young: The Housing Corporation normally obtains a first charge for its loans to housing associations in order to ensure the security of these public funds, but it will consider exceptions to this rule in appropriate circumstances where private finance is being offered.

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had recently with building societies about funding capital schemes in partnership with the Housing Corporation for private housing associations which are developing projects to care for the elderly.

Sir George Young: None of this particular subject, but proposals for the use of building society finance for housing association schemes, including projects for the elderly, have been put forward by the housing Corporation's private finance working party and are being considered by my Department.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the effect on the preparation of the arrangements for the transfer of services and contracts following the abolition of the Greater London council of the instructions which have been given to the Greater London council staff not to assist in the process of abolition; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I am aware of the concern among successor bodies that the reported instructions to GLC staff will hamper their ability to effect a smooth handover. I hope that the council will review its present stance and recognise its responsibilities to its staff and its ratepayers.

Fire Safety

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 11 December 1984, Official Report, column 443, stating his decision not to extend the scope of the Housing (Means of Escape from Fire in Houses in Multiple Occupation) Order (S.I., 1981, No. 1576), if he will (a) list the organisations which made representations to him in the course of his review of the extension of the order, (b) place copies of the responses of all organisations which submitted representations to his review of the order in the Library, (c) state how many of the organisations making representations to his review supported increased statutory protection for households from fire risks and how many opposed this step and (d) give full details of the consultations he held with tenants and occupiers of houses in multiple occupation in the course of his review.

Mr. Gow: Ten organisations outside central Government were consulted:

The Association of County Councils
The London Boroughs Association
The Association of District Councils
The Association of Metropolitan Authorities
The Greater London Council
The Institute of Housing
The Housing Corporation
The National Federation of Housing Associations
The Institute of Environmental Health Officers and
The Campaign for Single Homeless People
(on behalf of the Houses in Multiple Occupation Group)

Seven organisations supported an extension to SI 1981 No. 1576, though several attached conditions to their support; none was opposed to an extension.

The hon. Member may wish to ask those organisations about consultations which they had with tenants and occupiers, and whether they wish to supply him with copies of their replies to my Department's inquiries. I am aware of residents' views through correspondence, and from visits which I have made.

Local Government Superannuation Regulations

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to receive final comments from the local authority associations on the proposed amendment to regulation 3(4) of the Local Government Superannuation Regulations 1974, as amended, which was circulated for consultation in May 1983;

(2) when he expects to make the regulations referred to in the letter to the hon. Member for South Hams, of 26 April 1984, from the Minister of State for Local Government regarding regulation 3(4) of the Local Government Superannuation Regulations 1974 with regard to disqualification from war service reckoning.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The final comments from the local authority associations have now been received, and the regulations are expected to come into operation in April.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total of block grants to be received by each local authority in England in 1985-86 if it spends at the total of its grant-related expenditure assessment after the effects of holdback, in a manner consistent with his reply in the Official Report, 9 February 1984, column 764.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have arranged for this information to be placed in the Library.

Water Charges (North-West)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had from the president of the Manchester chamber of commerce and industry about the scale of likely water price increases in the north-west; what reply he is sending; if he will publish the president's letter in the Official Report, together with his reply; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The president's letter of 28 January expresses concern that the charges will rise faster that inflation under "new" financial arrangements, that they amount to covert taxation and that they affect the competitive position of industry. The arrangements have not changed: financial targets and external financing limits have been set for previous years. The increase in the North-West water authority's financial target to a modest 1·43 per cent. return on net assets cannot fairly be described as taxation. Increases in price are always unwelcome, but reasonable charges for water services ought to provide for a reasonable rate of return on assets.

Cold Weather Shooting Ban

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the meteorological stations concerned, their height above sea level in feet and their daily temperatures in degrees Fahrenheit for the 14 days before the cold weather shooting ban was put into force in January and for the seven subsequent days.

Mr. Waldegrave: This information is not readily available, and is not directly relevant to the decision to impose a shooting ban. The agreed criterion is based on the state of the ground and requires that a ban should be imposed if more than half of the 13 meteorological stations monitored record 13 continuous days of frost. The ban then comes into effect on the fifteenth day.

The following table shows the stations and indicates where ground was reported as frozen between 2 and 23 January.

Temple Bar

Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce his decision on the application for consent to move the Temple Bar from Theobalds Park in Hertfordshire to St. Paul's Churchyard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: This application was the subject of a public inquiry held between October 1983 and January 1984 and a resumed hearing in December 1984 to examine fresh evidence submitted by the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission. My right hon. Friend has accepted the advice of the inquiry inspector, who recommended in favour of granting consent. In reaching this decision my right hon. Friend paid particular attention to the possibility of damage to the monument and to the setting of St. Paul's Churchyard, but concluded that these factors were outweighed by the advantages of returning this important monument to the City where it could be seen and enjoyed by many more people than if retained at Theobalds park. The consent is subject to stringent conditions to ensure that the dismantling, repair and re-erection of the monument is carried out with every contractual and architectural care and to the satisfaction of the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Walden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what change he proposes to make to the Property Services Agency's cash limits for 1984-85.

Mr. Gow: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit on Class

XIV, Vote 2 will be increased by £10 million, from £351,630,000 to £361,630,000. The increase is required to pay for consultants' fees to meet the requirements of the defence works programme. It will be financed by a corresponding reduction in the Ministry of Defence cash limit (Class 1, Vote 5), so will not increase public expenditure.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Health Education Group

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what public funds are paid to the Scottish Health Education Group in the current financial year and for each year since 1979;

(2) what proportion of the budget of the Scottish Health Education Group is spent on campaigns to restrict smoking;

(3) what role the Scottish Health Education Group will be playing in the National No Smoking Day campaign 1985; and whether funds paid to the Group will be spent on this campaign.

Mr. John MacKay: Expenditure by the Scottish Health Group since 1979-80 is shown in the following table:

Financial year	SHEG Expenditure £000
1979-80	1,252
1980-81	1,540
1981-82	1,889
1982-83	2,136
1983-84	2,386
1984-85	*2,802

* Estimate.

In the current financial year approximately £302,000 — or 10·7 per cent. will be spent by the group on publicity campaigns to restrict smoking. Out of that sum the group has, in its capacity as a sponsoring body, made an initial payment of £1,500 to the National No Smoking Day Campaign 1985 and plans to spend a further £20,000 to promote the campaign in Scotland. The focus of the SHEG initiative is to be the provision, in association with Action on Smoking and Health, of an information shop for the public in the Waverley market, Edinburgh.

Cold Weather Shooting Ban

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the meteorological stations concerned, their height above sea level in feet and their daily temperatures in degrees Fahrenheit for the 14 days before the cold weather shooting ban was put into force in January and for the seven subsequent days.

Mr. Younger: The criteria and arrangements for the imposition of shooting bans in severe weather are based on recommendations made by the Nature Conservancy Council's working group on wildfowling bans in severe weather which reported in 1982. This group included representatives from the British Association for Shooting and Conservation, British Trust for Ornithology, British Field Sports Society, Game Conservancy Council and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds.

The Government accepted the working group's recommendation that a ban should be imposed where more than half the 13 agreed meteorological stations had recorded frosty weather for more than 13 consecutive days disregarding short spells of milder weather during that period. Frosty weather is defined in this context and for this purpose as "state of ground E4-5 (no snow but surface frozen or glaze) or E'0-9 (snow or measurable ice cover)".

Air temperature is not therefore relevant and is not recorded for the purpose of deciding on any ban on wildfowling. Three of the 13 meteorological stations are in Scotland at Dyce, Leuchars and Abbotsinch. Where the circumstances so warrant — for example, because weather conditions in Scotland are markedly different from those obtaining elsewhere in Great Britain — information is also sought from meteorological stations at Inverness, Prestwick and Carlisle.

Depending on the information received from the five Scottish stations and Carlisle, the decision whether or not to impose a ban, and the timing of any ban, may differ from that made in relation to England and Wales.

"Frosty weather", defined as indicated, was recorded at the Five Scottish stations and Carlisle on the dates shown.

Tourism (Expenditure)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the capital and current expenditure of each local authority in Scotland on tourism and tourist-related projects for the latest year for which figures are available in cash and per capita terms.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 30 January 1985, c. 205]: The latest available information is for 1982-83 and is provided in the table.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what is the number of community programme places currently sponsored by voluntary sector agencies;

(2) which voluntary sector agencies sponsor 200 or more community programme places;

(3) which local authorities sponsor 200 or more community programme places.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report those local authorities that sponsor 100 or more community programme places and give the number or places in each case.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall write to the hon. Members as soon as possible setting out the information that is available and will place a copy of my letters in the Library.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of community programme places allocated within the borough of Sunderland; and how many of these are sponsored by (a) voluntary sector agencies, (b) the local authority and (c) other sponsors.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available in the form requested. The borough of Sunderland is in the South Tyne and Wear area of the employment division of the Manpower Services Commission. On 14 December —the latest date for which figures are available—of the 3,428 filled places in the area, 1,115 were on projects sponsored by or through local authorities, and 2,313 were sponsored by other bodies.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current target figures for placements under the community programme; and how many have been approved by the Manpower Services Commission and how many filled for each Manpower Services Commission area at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on 26 March at column 29, which set out plans for the allocation of places on the community programme up to October 1986. On 14 December, the latest date for which information is available, 130,027 places were filled by employees. Approvals were current in respect of 152,304 places, but this total includes projects yet to start up or in the process of running down, and also takes account of temporary vacancies because of labour turnover. Information is collated centrally and made available about the number of filled places in each region.

Abbeystead Explosion

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the explosion at Abbeystead.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The report by the Health and Safety Executive to the Health and Safety Commission on the explosion at the Abbeystead water transfer station on 23 May 1984 is published today. A copy of the report has been placed in the Library.

The report sets out in detail how the explosion followed an accumulation of methane gas in the water transfer station.

The report draws attention to the fact that methane is soluble in water and that it can be given off by ground water entering workings. It makes recommendations to designers, constructors and operators of tunnelled raw water transfer systems to help improve safety standards. The findings are being widely publicised throughout the civil engineering profession and incorporated in professional training. The number of similar water transfer schemes in this country is extremely small.

A number of the recommendations contained in the report have already been implemented by the Health and Safety Executive. Following the explosion, the executive wrote to water authorities alerting them to the possible dangers of water transfer and comparable systems where methane may create a risk. Interim advice on the risk of gas evolution at water boreholes has been produced for the guidance of users. Further advice on the wider aspects of methane evolution from ground water is also being prepared.

My right hon. Friend has asked the Health and Safety Commission to report to him as soon as possible on the implementation of the outstanding recommendations in the report; and to inform itself and keep him informed of any issues which local people may wish to raise when they have had the opportunity to study the report.

This was a most tragic occurrence, and the deepest sympathy has been extended to those who suffered loss, or injury in this explosion. We are determined to see that every possible lesson is learnt and applied.

Notifiable Installations

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report, for the most recent available date, for each local authority area in Scotland, the number of notifiable installations constituting a major hazard.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: [pursuant to his reply, 5 February 1985, c. 493]: By the end of December 1984 the numbers of installations notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification and Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 for each local authority area in Scotland—on a regional or island basis—were as follows:

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of installations in each county notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substance Regulations 1982.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 5 February 1985, c. 493]: The number of installations notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 for each county in England are as follows. The numbers for counties in Wales have been given in my replies to the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on 17 January at column 214 and on 29 January at column 89; and for local authority areas in Scotland in my reply to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) today.

TRANSPORT

Motocross Cycles (Safety)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the Transport and Road Research Laboratory will assess the safety of motocross bicycles; if he has received any representations on this subject; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: All new bicycles normally used on the roads, including BMX cycles, are required to meet British Standard BS 6102. The Transport and Road Research Laboratory was involved in the preparation of the standard and has no present plans for further assessment.

Some representations have been received about irresponsible behaviour on public roads and pavements by BMX riders; current publicity leaflets issued by my Department encourage safe riding of these cycles.

Wilstead Road, Elstow

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Transport when notice of the making of the experimental order to prohibit all vehicles except buses and pedal cycles from turning right from the A6 trunk road into Wilstead road, Elstow, is to be given; and when it will come into operation.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend hopes to give notice shortly of the making of the experimental order, which will come into operation before the end of this month.

Air Services Licences

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to require airlines granted air services licences to commence services within a specific time of the grant of the licence and thereafter to maintain it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: A decision on whether or not to operate a route for which it has been granted a licence is a matter for an airline's commercial judgment. However, under arrangements introduced last year, the Civil Aviation Authority intends to review licences regularly and sector rights which are not being used and whose retention cannot be justified will be liable to revocation. I do not think that there is a need for legislation.

Scottish Aerodromes

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent discussions between his Department, the Scottish Development Agency and the Civil Aviation Authority about the future of aerodromes in the Highlands and Islands in Scotland currently in the ownership of the Civil Aviation Authority.

Mr. Michael Spicer: In evaluating the offers both the Government and the authority were concerned that the aerodromes should continue to be operated on a basis which meets the essential social needs of the communities concerned. The extent to which offers would have resulted in a significant reduction in the subsidy requirement was also taken into consideration. We have concluded that none of the offers received was satisfactory.

The aerodromes will continue to be owned and operated by the CAA for the time being but we are considering in the context of airports policy generally if alternative arrangements might be appropriate in the longer term.

Vehicle Examiners

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what action he is proposing to take arising from the reference in the annual report of the traffic commissioner for the south east traffic area to the shortage of examiners having hindered an acceptable level of enforcement;

(2) whether he is proposing to take any action from the reference in the annual reports of the traffic commissioners for the eastern, south Wales and west midland traffic areas concerning the lack of recruitment of examiners;

(3) whether he is proposing to take any action arising from the reference in the annual report of the traffic commissioner for the Scottish traffic area to recruitment of examiners not having kept pace with the work or having dealt with backlogs;

(4) whether he is proposing to take any action arising from the reference in the annual report of the traffic commissioners for the eastern traffic area to the decrease in prohibitions resulting from spot checks being probably due to fewer checks rather than better standards of maintenance;

(5) whether he is proposing to take any action arising from the reference in the annual report of the traffic commissioner for the Scottish traffic area to the shortage of vehicle examiners dangerously limiting control on standards of vehicle safety.

Mrs. Chalker: Recruitment of vehicle examiners was temporarily suspended while the Government considered the scope for greater efficiency of the heavy goods and public service vehicle testing. This led to a shortage of vehicle examiners in some traffic areas during 1983-84. When the decision not to proceed with the transfer to the private sector was announced in July 1983, a recruitment campaign was immediately organised. Thirty seven new vehicle examiners were recruited and trained, but were only beginning to take up posts at the end of 1983-84, the period to which the traffic commissioners' reports relate. Further recruitment is now in progress to fill another 40 posts, which will bring the vehicle examiner strength well up to complement by mid-1985.

Channel Tunnel (Study)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he still expects the Anglo-French study group on the Channel tunnel to report by the end of February.

Mr. David Mitchell: Yes.

European Ferries

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what consultations have taken place between his Department and European Ferries following its decision to lay up the ship Dragon;

(2) what consultations have taken place between his Department and the French Government over the decision by European Ferries to lay up the British ship Dragon and retain in service the French ship Leopard.

Mr. David Mitchell: None.

London Taxis

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made in ensuring that in future taxis in London are suitable for carrying disabled people, including those in wheelchairs.

Mrs. Chalker: I am delighted to be able to tell the House that since I last reported progress on this matter on 22 December 1983, extensive consultation has taken place with the cab trade and other interested bodies and the assistant commissioner for the Metropolitan police, who is the licensing authority for all London taxis, has amended the conditions of fitness to require all cabs offered for type approval on or after 1 January 1985 to be capable of accommodating a disabled person in a wheelchair and to facilitate the carriage of disabled people generally.

I believe that this will be a major step in ensuring that the transport needs of disabled people in London and other major cities are more effectively met in the future.

WALES

Wintex-Cimex 85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will (a) list the responsibilities and functions of the officials from his Department involved in Wintex-Cimex 85 and (b) state the date and purposes of the meetings they will attend in the course of these duties.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the local authorities in Wales which have indicated to his Department that they intend participating in Wintex-Cimex 85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply he received from my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 30 November 1984 at columns 597-98.

Welsh Language (Educational Material)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will ensure that the Welsh joint education committee will publish materials produced for Welsh-speaking fourth and fifth-form pupils by University College, Aberystwyth, as part of its project for his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: My right hon. Friend will give careful consideration to the possibility of the WJEC undertaking publication. His prime concern will be to ensure that the materials reach the classrooms as rapidly as possible.

Congenital Malformations (Review)

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department has concluded its review of congenital malformations in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My Department's review has been completed and I am today publishing the results in full as a report entitled "The incidence of congenital malformations in Wales, with particular reference to the district of Torfaen, Gwent." I have placed a copy in the Library.

I initiated this review as part of a response to public concern in Pontypool at the operation there of Re-Chem International Ltd's industrial waste disposal plant following the establishment by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland of an independent review under Professor J.M.A. Lenihan of unusual features of morbidity in the Denny-Bonnybridge area. At the outset I asked my Department to review statistics for Pontypool similar to those published by the Scottish Office immediately prior to the setting up of the Lenihan inquiry. These included the incidence of cancers and of babies born with congenital abnormalities. While the figures published on the incidence of cancers in Torfaen revealed no cause for concern, the data produced on congenital malformations were insufficiently detailed to provide a confident basis upon which to reach conclusive judgments. As a consequence I commissioned a more detailed and extensive study covering a longer period.

The review has compared from routinely available statistical data the incidence over the period 1974 to 1983 of all babies with certain congenital malformations in each of the district council areas of Wales. The malformations chosen include those about which particular public concern has recently been expressed, notably specific abnormalities of the eye. For each condition, the rate for Torfaen has been compared with that for the county of Gwent and for Wales as a whole.

The results indicate that for all babies with congenital abnormalities and for most of the specific conditions reviewed, Torfaen had over the 10-year period incidence rates less than those for Wales and less or not significantly higher than those for Gwent. In the case of only two conditions, anencephalus and polydactyly, was the rate significantly higher than that for Wales; in the case of the latter it was also significantly higher than the rate for Gwent. A higher than average incidence of anencephalus in the south Wales valleys during the past 30 years has been reported in medical journals since 1967. My Department has recently conveyed to Professor Michael Laurence of the university of Wales college of medicine, its support in principle to his request for funding of a continuation of some of his previous work on congenital abnormalities of the central nervous system. He has new been asked to include in this work the latest findings on anencephalus and, because of his special interest in congenital abnormalities, the previously undocumented elevated rate for polydactyly.

A special effort has been made to review the incidence of two particular abnormalities of the eye, anophthalmos and microphthalmos, about which there has been public concern. No cases of either of these two conditions is recorded as having been notified in the Torfaen area. The incidence rate for Gwent is below that for Wales.

My Department also examined statistics on the level of spontaneous abortions in individual districts of Gwent and throughout Wales and the ratios of girls to boys at birth in all districts in Wales as well as studying the ratios among cohorts of 5-year-old children registered at New Inn primary school, Pontypool. The results of this work are also published, as appendices to the report. Over the 10-year period the rate of recorded spontaneous abortions in Gwent was significantly higher than that for Wales as a whole. However, the rate for Torfaen was not significantly higher than the rate for Gwent. There is no evidence that the female to male sex ratios at birth in Torfaen differ significantly from the all Wales average over the 10-year period.

The review of conditions covered in this report — apart for anencephalus and polydactyly — does not indicate that the experience of Torfaen residents is in any way exceptional. The Lenihan report may indicate the need nonetheless to consider further action.

In the meantime, I have asked my Department to consider what may need to be done in Wales to improve the present arrangements for the notification of congenital malformations and of any other national data bases used for epidemiological studies.

Residents of the Pontpool area should be reassured by this report. In addition, I am sure that the authorities with a more local responsibility for public health would be ready, together with my Department, to consider any evidence of further concern.

Beef (Intervention Storage Costs)

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much it costs to store a body of beef weighing 300 kg in the intervention cold store for six months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Intervention beef is held in commercial stores and information about unit costs is not given on grounds of commercial confidentiality. The overall cost of storing and handling intervention beef in the United Kingdom in 1983-84 was £5·2 million.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Party Leaders (Discussions)

14. Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his most recent round of discussions with the Northern Ireland party leaders.

Mr. Hurd: The party leaders have all said publicly that they are willing to discuss whether there is any common ground from which new arrangements for administering Northern Ireland could be developed. I am encouraging them to start practical discussions. The best way forward is for them to proceed quietly and in confidence.

Republic of Ireland (Extradition)

15. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to improve the procedures involved when applying for the extradition to Northern Ireland of suspects from the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Scott: I am satisfied that existing procedures for the forwarding of warrants to the Garda Siochana under the unique reciprocal arrangements for the backing of warrants, are adequate.

Funerals (Incidents)

17. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions in the last 12 months the security forces have intervened to control incidents at funerals in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: During 1984 the Royal Ulster Constabulary intervened at five funerals to prevent paramilitary displays from taking place.

Young Persons (Supplementary Benefit)

19. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many young people have had supplementary benefit reduced for either (a) refusing to go on a youth training programme scheme or (b) prematurely leaving a youth training programme scheme, to the latest available date.

Mr. Chris Patten: None.

Tucano Project

20. Mr. Molyneaux asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from trades unions in Short Brothers on the Tucano project.

Dr. Boyson: The trades unions in Shorts have written to my right hon. Friend expressing their strong support for the company's bid for the new Royal Air Force basic trainer contract. Their letter points out the merit of the Shorts Tucano for this contract and highlights the employment which would result both in Northern Ireland and elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Terrorism

21. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will report progress on the eradication of terrorism in the Province.

Mr. Hurd: There has been a steady decrease in the level of violence in Northern Ireland and a gradual return to normality over recent years. This is encouraging but gives no grounds for complacency. The Government will continue fully to support the security forces in their efforts to eradicate terrorism.

Sinn Fein

22. Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if any meetings have taken place between civil servants in his Department and Sinn Fein representatives since he took office.

Mr. Hurd: Since I became Secretary of State for Northern Ireland there have been no meetings between officials in the Northern Ireland Office and representatives of Sinn Fein. As the House knows, officials at local level in the Northern Ireland departments occasionally meet Sinn Fein representatives, when this is necessary to ensure that constituency matters are dealt with in a fair and proper manner.

Lear Fan Project

23. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the financial implications of the Government's involvement in the Lear Fan project.

Dr. Boyson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 19 December 1984, at column 216.

New Ireland Forum

24. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will reconsider his attitude to the report of the New Ireland Forum.

Mr. Hurd: The Government's consistent and realistic attitude to the report of the New Ireland Forum has been to recognise and welcome what is in it of positive value, but to point out that the three specific options set out in the report cannot be accepted since they would not receive the consent of a majority of people in Northern Ireland. The importance of this consent was recognised by the Forum report. I see no grounds for changing this assessment.

Orlit Houses

25. Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he plans to introduce legislation to place owners of Orlit houses in Northern Ireland in the same position as owners in Great Britain.

Mr. Chris Patten: The necessary legislation has proved more complex than expected, but proposals will be brought forward as soon as possible.

Hospital Facilities (Bangor)

26. Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the need for fuller hospital facilities in Bangor; if he will institute a public inquiry to examine the case for a new acute hospital in Bangor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: None. Any such assessment would be a matter in the first instance for the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, which is responsible for the administration and organisation of health and personal social services in its area.

Terrorism

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the statistics for terrorist activity and security forces' activity in Northern Ireland for the year ended 31 December 1984.

Mr. Hurd: The statistics on security for each year since 1971, including those for the year ended 31 December 1984, together with the conviction statistics for the last six months of 1984, are as follows:

Statistics on security—Part I (yearly figures)

Notes on the tables:

1. The offence classifications are based on those used by the Crown and Peace Office in its annual return.
2. The tables relate to persons convicted at the Belfast Crown court. This covers all scheduled offences tried on indictment.
3. Some jury trials are included in cases where the Attorney General certified out of the schedule mode of trial, ie non-terrorist serious offences.
4. Where a person has been convicted of more than one offence only the most serious or that which received the longest sentence is recorded in the statistics.

Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of cases in which persons were convicted of scheduled offences in Northern Ireland in 1984 on the basis of evidence given by accomplices on behalf of the Crown in which evidence, other than of the accomplice, either forensic, from other non-supergrass witnesses or by an admission of guilt from the accused, was used to obtain the conviction.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 January 1985, c. 71]: Courts make their decisions having regard to all of the admissible evidence which is placed before them. It is not possible to identify cases in which the eventual decision depended only on accomplice evidence.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Passports

28. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the introduction of a requirement to present passports at the border between the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None recently.

Interpol

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what contact his Department has in supporting the international detection organisation Interpol in its work; what improvements in its efficiency are likely to be achieved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Home Office deals with the United Kingdom's annual subscription to Interpol and financial provision for the national central bureau of Interpol, which is located in London. Home Office officials also attend Interpol conferences and maintain regular contact with senior officers of the national central bureau. The Association of Chief Police Officers has established a working party to review the working methods of the United Kingdom national central bureau with the aim of evaluating the bureau's existing resources and its future pattern of work.

Laboratory Animals

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what regulations and requirements he has issued to laboratory animal breeders; and if he has any further plans for regulation and control of their activities.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no power to issue any such regulations or requirements. His plans for controlling the breeding of laboratory animals were set out in the White Paper "Scientific Procedures on Living Animals" (Cmnd. 8883). Legislation to enact the White Paper proposals will be introduced as soon as parliamentary time permits.

Special Constabulary

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by police force area, the number of arrests recorded on an annual basis by special constables.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Griston Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when Griston prison will receive its first prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: It is hoped that commissioning of the new Wayland prison at Griston, Norfolk, will be sufficiently advanced for the first inmates to be received later this month.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners, and what types of prisoners, Griston prison will accommodate.

Mr. Mellor: The new prison will accommodate 484 category "C" prisoners serving sentences of between 18 months and four years.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of prisoners in Griston prison will have (a) integral sanitation and (b) access to sanitation at night.

Mr. Mellor: Four hundred and forty-eight of the 484 prisoners will be accommodated in single cells with integral sanitation. The remaining 36 prisoners will be accommodated in the pre-release unit and will have access to sanitation facilities at night.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the dimensions of single cells at Griston prison.

Mr. Mellor: 3.375m long by 2.145m wide by 2.480m high.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how far off the floor cell windows will be at Griston prison.

Mr. Mellor: Nine hundred and fifty millimetres.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the ratio of water closets to prisoners at Griston prison.

Mr. Mellor: In addition to the integral sanitation facilities installed in the cells there are 90 water closets for the use of prisoners located in various parts of the establishment. The ratio of water closets to prisoners is therefore approximately 1: 0.9. A total of 95 urinals has also been provided.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the ratio of baths, showers and washbasins to prisoners at Griston prison.

Mr. Mellor: Nineteen baths, 76 showers and 565 washbasins (including those installed in the cells) have been provided for the use of prisoners. The approximate ratios of appliances to prisoners are therefore as follows:

	Ratio
Baths	1: 25·47
Showers	1: 6·37
Washbasins	1: 0·86

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what facilities for education are provided at Griston prison.

Mr. Mellor: The facilities for education comprise a woodwork classroom, pottery and art classrooms, two further crafts rooms, an outdoor activities room, music room, library, two informal classrooms, a remedial classroom, a general purpose classroom and a display area. There are also appropriate offices for staff and toilet facilities for staff and prisoners.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what facilities for indoor and outdoor recreation are provided at Griston prison.

Mr. Mellor: At Her Majesty's prison Wayland, which is at Griston, Norfolk, each of the four house blocks has a general association and games area, group and television viewing rooms, a quiet room and a record playing room. In addition there is a central sports hall with a remedial area. Outdoor recreational facilities comprise grassed playing fields for rugby, soccer and cricket and hard surface playing areas.

Homeless Persons (Convictions)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of people who committed criminal offences in each single year since 1979 were designated as homeless.

Mr. Mellor: The information collected centrally relates to persons prosecuted for criminal offences and does not separately identify those who were homeless.

Naturalisation

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what effect the diversion of Metropolitan police officers to mining areas has had on the time taken to process naturalisation applications.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None.

Syrians (Deportation)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he will make a statement on the deportation of four men holding Syrian passports on or about 29 January;

(2) why four men travelling on Syrian passports were arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism Act and deported to Damascus on 29 January;

(3) whether four men travelling on Syrian passports who were arrested by the Metropolitan police under the Prevention of Terrorism Act and deported on 29 January held diplomatic passports and were accredited to the Syrian embassy in London.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the recent incident in which Syrian nationals were required to leave the United Kingdom; and what was the reason for his decision in this matter.

Mr. Brittan: Four men holding Syrian passports were arrested by the Metropolitan police on 20 January under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984. It is not the practice to disclose the reasons for such arrests. I subsequently authorised extensions of detention to 27 January to enable the police to continue with their inquiries, at the conclusion of which I understand that there was insufficient evidence to support criminal charges. On 27 January the four men were detained under the Immigration Act 1971, and on 29 January they were deported to Damascus on my personal direction on the ground that their presence in the United Kingdom was not conducive to the public good. One of the men carried a Syrian diplomatic passport in addition to a normal passport; none was accredited to the Syrian embassy in London.

Fire Accident Statistics

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide details of the total number of people who were (a) killed and (b) injured as a result of fires in the following categories of houses in multiple occupation in England between September 1983 and December 1984 (i) detached, semi-detached or terraced houses in multiple occupation, (ii) hostels and (iii) hotels and guest houses.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information for 1984 is not yet available. Information for the year 1983 is given in the following table.

Casualties from fires in certain types of buildings

England	Number Casualties
	Fatal	Non-fatal
Detached, semi-detached or terraced houses in multiple occupation	59	748
Hostels and similar institutions*	3	54
Hotels, boarding houses, guest houses, motels*	7	67

* Corresponding figures for England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are given in table 30 of "Fire Statistics United Kingdom 1983".

Mr. John Neil

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many letters he has received from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside concerning Mr. John Neil; and how many replies he has sent;

(2) when he first received representations from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside concerning Mr. John Neil; and when he expects to reply.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has received two letters about Mr. John Neil from the hon. Member, the first of which arrived on 6 November. My noble Friend sent a detailed reply on 6 February.

Stateless Persons

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many stateless people are currently residing in the United Kingdom; how this compares with 1974; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is not available.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time it takes to answer correspondence from hon. Members; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: It is not possible to calculate the average time without disproportionate cost, but every effort is made to ensure that there are no avoidable delays.

Chelmsford Prison (AIDS)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied that all the inmates of Chelmsford prison are free from the disease acquired immune deficiency syndrome following the death of the chaplain from the disease; if he has had any discussions with the governor since the incident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The district medical officer for the Mid-Essex health authority has visited Chelmsford prison. Guidance has also been obtained from the Chief Medical Officer for the DHSS and the Centre for the Surveillance of Communicable Diseases. There are no suspected cases of AIDS at Chelmsford prison. The deputy director of Prison Medical Services is visiting the prison today and I shall make a further statement in due course.

Unsentenced Prisoners

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State of 31 January, Official Report, column 255, whether the 25 unsentenced prisoners included prisoner 50804.

Mr. Mellor: They included a prisoner whose number was C50804.

Car Radios

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the revenue which would be raised from levying a £5 licence fee on each car radio.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Immigration

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which immigration rule permits the husband of a British citizen, settled in the United Kingdom, to be refused entry solely on medical grounds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I am writing to the hon. Member.

Diplomats (Traffic Offences)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many parking tickets were evaded by diplomats in 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 576]: The available information relates to all fixed penalty notices and is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (table 22 of the issue published in 1984) a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Information for 1983 and 1984 is not yet available.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Staff (Monitoring)

Mr. Madden asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what action is being taken to monitor regularly the country of origin of all staff employed in the House; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Beith: No action is currently being taken to monitor the country of origin of staff employed by the House of Commons Commission. The House authorities have however adopted the race relations policy statement agreed for the Civil Service, and an equal opportunities officer has been appointed in the Establishments Office. Consideration will be given to the introduction of monitoring of existing staff and applicants for employment in the light of the results of surveys currently being undertaken in the Civil Service.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he intends to take to seek to ensure a successful conclusion to the non-proliferation treaty review conference.

Mr. Luce: Our policy towards the non-proliferation treaty review conference is under consideration at present. It will reflect our very firm commitment to the treaty which has been successful in preventing the further spread of nuclear weapons and has contributed significantly to the security of all its parties.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he plans with the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics about the forthcoming review conference of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Luce: We plan to continue to hold regular consultations with the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics about arms control matters, including the non-proliferation treaty. Such consultations usually take place on a bilateral basis, but there are also trilateral meetings arising from the fact that the United Kingdom, United States and USSR are the depositary Governments designated by article IX(2) of the treaty. The consultations have revealed a common determination to support the treaty and to strengthen the non-proliferation regime.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will propose an amendment to the non-proliferation treaty to ensure that no country will provide any kind of nuclear help to countries which withdraw from the treaty.

Mr. Luce: We do not intend to propose any amendments to the non-proliferation treaty. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) on 28 January, at column 39, we are not aware that any party is contemplating withdrawal from the treaty, membership of which makes it easier to acquire nuclear equipment and material for peaceful purposes. No country has left since the NPT came into force, and the fact that there were three new parties in 1984 demonstrates that support for this important and successful arms control measure continues to grow.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent meetings he and other Ministers in his Department have had with members of the Sri Lankan Cabinet.

Mr. Renton: On 30 January my right hon. and learned Friend met the Sri Lankan Foreign Minister, who also called on my noble Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 31 January. My noble Friend also met the Sri Lankan Minister of National Security on 31 January. During these meetings we discussed matters of mutual interest, including the situation in Sri Lanka. My right hon. and learned Friend took the opportunity to urge the Sri Lankan Government to continue their efforts to reach a negotiated settlement on the inter-communal problem. He also drew attention to the growing public and parliamentary concern in this country about reports of human rights abuses in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date members of the Sri Lankan Cabinet recently visited Britain; which visitors were met by Ministers and staff in his Department; and what was the breakdown of costs to public funds.

Mr. Renton: The Sri Lankan Foreign Minister paid a private visit to the United Kingdom from 28 January to 3 February. The Sri Lankan Minister of National Security also passed through London on 31 January on his way back to Sri Lanka from the United States. For details of ministerial meetings with the two Sri Lankan Ministers I would refer the hon. Member to my answer to his earlier question. During these meetings my right hon. and learned Friend and my noble Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office were accompanied by officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. As both visits were private there was no cost to public funds.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those courses, arranged in conjuction with his Department, provided in Britain for Sri Lankan police or security personnel.

Mr. Renton: The information is as follows:

Date	Number of Officers	Course
26 March 1984 (for 10 weeks)	1	Overseas Command Course (Bramshill)
30 April 1984 (for 10 weeks)	1	Overseas Officers Criminal Investigation Course (West Yorkshire Constabulary)
14 May 1984 (for 3 months)	1	Document Examination Attachment (Metropolitan Police)
9 July 1984 (for 10 weeks)	1	Overseas Command Course (Bramshill)
7 January 1985 (for 18 weeks)	1	Driving School Management Course (Lancashire Constabulary)
7 January–4 February 1985	1	Instruction Training Attachment (Essential Planning Unit, Harrogate; Bramshill and Hendon Police College)
21 January 1985 (for 10 weeks)	1	Overseas Criminal Investigation Course (West Yorkshire Constabulary)

In addition, we provide limited training in the UK, funded by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, for a small number of personnel from the Sri Lankan armed forces on the same basis as for personnel from other Commonwealth and friendly countries.

Republic of Ireland (Minister for Foreign Affairs)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about his meeting with the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Ireland on Monday 4 February.

Mr. Renton: The meeting was one of a continuing series within the framework of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council. My right hon. and learned Friend was accompanied at the meeting by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Gibraltar

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy, during the talks in Geneva on the future of Gibraltar, that in the absence of a satisfactory agreement safeguarding the nationality and the standard of living of the citizens of Gibraltar, they will retain the option of granting full independence to Gibraltar.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the statement which my right hon. and learned Friend made in the House on 6 February at columns 942-3, and to the answer which he gave to the hon. Member in answer to a question which he raised following that statement.

PRIME MINISTER

Coal Industry Dispute

Q12. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister what is the total estimate of the cost to date to public funds and nationalised industries of the mining dispute.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in answer to a question by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 24 January at column 501.

Welwyn

Q63. Mr. Murphy asked the Prime Minister, if she will pay a visit to the parish of Welwyn.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Limited List Prescribing

Q67. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will receive a delegation from the leaders of the pharmaceutical industry and the medical profession on the limited list proposals.

The Prime Minister: I have received no requests for a meeting from either organisation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health have already met representatives of both the industry and the profession in recent weeks.

Libya (British Detainees)

Q73. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Prime Minister what recent representations she has made to the Libyan authorities, including Colonel Gaddafi, about the detention of Britons in Libya.

The Prime Minister: I warmly welcome the release of the four Britons who have been held in Libya since mid-May 1984. During their detention, we have made representations through a variety of channels, especially the Italian protecting power, to press for the earliest possible release of the hostages. We have also worked closely with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has been in constant contact with his special representative, Mr. Terry Waite. I am deeply grateful to them both for the humanitarian mission which Mr. Terry Waite has undertaken to secure the hostages' freedom, and I should like to pay tribute to the patience and outstanding skill with which Mr. Waite successfully completed his mission.

Chief Secretary to the Treasury

Q92. Mr. Bidwell asked the Prime Minister if she will dismiss the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

The Prime Minister: No.

Young Persons (Training)

Q106. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about the employment and training opportunities which exist for young people in British industry.

The Prime Minister: Although only industry and commerce can create sustainable jobs, the Government are concerned to see that there are constructive and worthwhile opportunities for young people to have proper training whether employed or unemployed. Much has already been achieved, particularly through the youth training scheme, and the Government are currently reviewing the range of provision for young people. But employers will continue to have a key role in providing training, if it is to be relevant to industry's needs.

Craigmaddie

Q16. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Craigmaddie.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Teesside

Q76. Mr. Bell asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Teesside.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Racial Equality (Code)

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to ensure that the Commission for Racial Equality's code of practice is adhered to by those who supply goods and services under contract to Her Majesty's Government; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: On a number of occasions Ministers have made clear their support for the code and its recommendations for good employment practice. Since the code came into operation on 1 April 1984, the Department of Employment's race relations employment advisory service has been in regular contact with industry, including many firms which supply goods and services under contract to Her Majesty's Government, seeking to persuade them to consider and apply the practical guidance given in the code.

Chile

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will list all public statements made by Ministers since April 1981 on the regime in Chile.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will list all meetings held between Ministers and members of the Chilean Government and military since April 1982; and what was the purpose of each meeting.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 28 January 1985, c. 23.]:

(a) The visit to Chile in September 1982 of the then. Minister for Trade, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Rees), to review commercial relations.

(b) A brief courtesy call on the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement, my hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie), during the service visit of General Matthei, the commander-in-chief of the Chilean air force in March 1983.

(c) Farewell ministerial calls in March 1983 by the outgoing Chilean ambassador, consequent upon his appointment as Chilean Minister for Foreign Affairs.

(d) Visit to Chile in April 1983 by the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) to review our bilateral relations.

(e) Meetings between the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary and the Chilean Foreign Minister at the United Nations General Assembly in 1982, 1983 and 1984 as part of the normal series of bilateral meetings between Foreign Ministers on these occasions.

(f) A meeting between the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), and the Chilean Foreign Minister, as part of the series of courtesy meetings between foreign representatives to the inauguration of the new President of Ecuador, in August 1984.

Engagements

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

Mr. Beith asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

Mr. Loyden asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Nellist asked the Prime Minister which Government Departments were involved in the recent visit to the United Kingdom by members of the Sri Lankan Government.

The Prime Minister: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office was the only Government Department involved in the recent visits. The Sri Lankan Foreign Minister, in the course of a private visit to the United Kingdom, called on my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 30 January and on my noble Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Baroness Young, on 31 January. The Sri Lankan Minister of National Security, who paid a private visit to the United Kingdom on 31 January, also called on my noble Friend Baroness Young.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Telecom (Northern Ireland)

29. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will ensure that appropriate security checks are applied for employees of British Telecom in Northern Ireland whose duties have security implications.

Mr. Butcher: I can confirm that British Telecom, as for any company with employees involved in security related work, complies with the Government's requirement that all necessary security checks are carried out.

Overseas Investment

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the total of United Kingdom overseas investment since May 1979 in (a) manufacturing and (b) non-manufacturing, showing the proportions invested in the European Economic Community, other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development members and non-Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries, respectively.

Mr. Channon: The information available relates to overseas direct investment between 1979 and 1982 and is given in the table.

Total net outward direct investment (excluding oil) 1979-82

	Manufacturing	Non-manufacturing
World total £ million	6,660	7,373

Pirate Radio Stations

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has taken any steps, or proposes to take any, in relation to radio stations operating illegally in British territorial waters in interference with stations operating legally from the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Butcher: No radio broadcasting station operates in British territorial waters. If one did, my Department would take vigorous action against it, particularly if it were interfering with legitimate radio users. Two unauthorised broadcasting stations, Radio Caroline and Radio Laser operate from vessels in the North sea, anchored outside territorial waters and therefore outside United Kingdom jurisdiction. The Marine, Etc.

Broadcasting (Offences) Act 1967 makes it an offence for persons in the United Kingdom to supply the stations or otherwise support or promote their activities. Prosecutions under the Act are the responsibility of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on recent raids on pirate radio stations; and if he will list all those radio stations raided.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 6 February 1985, c. 580]: From the beginning of 1985 to 4 February 1985, the radio investigation service took action against unlicensed broadcasters on radio and television on 24 occasions. For comparison, in 1984 the RIS took action against unlicensed broadcasters on 124 occasions.

Unlicensed, unregulated use of radio can cause interference and annoyance to legitimate radio users who have licences and operate in accordance with them. Some unlicensed stations cause interference to emergency and safety of life services. Unlicensed stations also block frequencies which cannot then be allocated to legitimate radio users.

The names and locations of unlicensed broadcasters and the number of occasions on which action has been taken against them so far this year are:

Isle of Man Steam Packet Service

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer to the Director General of Fair Trading the termination of the Isle of Man steam packet service from the island to Liverpool.

Mr. Fletcher: I understand the Director General of Fair Trading is currently considering a proposed merger involving the Isle of Man Steam Company and Sealink which would affect ferry services to the Isle of Man. If the Director General decides that this is a qualifying merger under the Fair Trading Act 1973 he will advise the Secretary of State as to whether a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission should be made.

Japan (Technological Links)

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to make a statement to the House about any proposals for links, funded in whole or in part by Her Majesty's Government, between the United Kingdom and Japan, involving information technology development, before these are agreed between the interested parties.

Mr. Pattie: I would not wish to rule out any co-operation which is to the benefit of the United Kingdom but it must be for those companies intending to carry out the work to agree their proposals amongst themselves before seeking Government support.

Walters Microsymptons International Ltd.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from schools in Bradford about difficulties they are experiencing in obtaining equipment from Walters Microsystems International Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I have received no reports from schools in Bradford about difficulties they are experiencing in obtaining equipment from Walters Microsystems International Ltd. However if the hon. Member has any specific cases in mind I would be pleased to hear further details.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Salaries)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current average salary of a teacher; and what it would be with 4 per cent. added.

Sir Keith Joseph: The average salary for teachers in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England and Wales—excluding special schools—based on the number and distribution of teachers in March 1984 is about £9,700. A 4 per cent. increase would bring that to around £10,100. However, there is a wide range of salaries. The average salary by scale—rounded to the nearest £100—is as follows:

Scale 1	7,700
Scale 2	9,000
Scale 3	10,600
Scale 4	12,200
Senior teacher	13,300
Deputy head teacher	11,700
Head teacher	13,200

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what salary increases for teachers there have been in each year since 1974 set against the rate for inflation in the same year; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information is given in the following table. Teachers' pay settlements apply from 1 April and in the table all pay increases are attributed to the April of the year to which they relate, although the figures for 1974 and 1980 represent a consolidation of separate settlements applicable from two or more dates during those years. The retail price index increases are those for the 12 months preceding the settlement date.

Year from 1 April	Increases in the RPI	Increases in teachers pay per cent.

* A negotiated settlement of 8 per cent. from 1 April plus an additional 27 per cent. by the Houghton committee taking effect from 24 May and estimated as providing a further 2 per cent. in the long-term.
† 14·6 per cent. arbitration award plus an additional 17·9 per cent. by the Clegg commission.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the current pay scales of teachers; and what they would be if 4 per cent. were added.

Sir Keith Joseph: The tables give the information requested for qualified full-time teachers in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England and Wales, excluding special schools where different scales apply to some 16,000 teachers. These scales are set out in the Remuneration of Teachers (Primary and Secondary) (Amendment) Order 1984, SI No. 1650.

Teachers (Computer Training)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what programmes he plans to initiate for the purpose of training secondary school teachers in the application and working of computers.

Mr. Dunn: We estimate that the microelectronics education programme and the local education authorities have already provided relevant training for some 80,000 secondary teachers. The Government are considering how best to maintain the impetus when the present phase of the programme comes to an end in March 1986.

Special Schools

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the pupil-teacher ratio in special schools for each year since 1979-80; and what are the projected pupil-teacher ratios until 1987-88.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratios for maintained and non-maintained special schools — including hospital schools—in England for each year from 1980 to 1984 are as follows:

January of each year	Pupil-teacher ratio
1980	7·6
1981	7·6
1982	7·5
1983	7·3
1984	7·1

No projections are available of total teacher numbers or pupil teacher ratios in all special schools including non-maintained schools.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of the total school population has been educated in special schools for each year since 1979-80; and what are the projected figures to the year 1987-88.

Mr. Dunn: The proportion of the total school population in England in January of each year from 1980 to 1984 inclusive, who attended maintained and non-maintained special schools, including hospital schools, was 1·5 per cent. The same percentage is projected for each year up to 1988.

Peace Studies

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to issue guidelines on the teaching of peace studies in primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend set out his views on the teaching of peace studies in primary and secondary schools in his speech to a conference organised by the National Council of Women on 3 March 1984, a copy of which is in the Library. He has at present no plans to publish further guidance on this matter.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

World Bank Special Fund for Sub-Saharan Africa

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution the United Kingdom is now making to the World Bank special fund for sub-Saharan Africa; if such aid is tied to the purchase of British goods; and if the amounts involved are in addition to the figures for his Department in the recent White Paper on public expenditure.

Mr. Raison: The Government have undertaken to earmark, for use in close support of the special facility and its objectives, disbursements of £15 million a year of bilateral aid in each of the five years during which it is expected that the facility will disburse funds.

We are still considering whether in this case we should waive our normal rule under which offshore procurement from bilateral aid is tied to British goods and services.

The money to be earmarked is not in addition to the figures for the ODA in the recent White Paper. In planning our aid programme, however, we always make allowance for sensible new commitments. The important consideration is that the aid should be fully effective.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Polling Stations (Ramps)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which local authorities have been helped with the purchase of portable ramps for use for the disabled at polling stations.

Mr. Peter Rees: This information is not readily available from the records of election claims maintained by the Treasury and could be provided only at a disproportionate expenditure of time and resources.

Unearned Income

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what gross unearned income would be needed to provide a net annual income of £200,000, £400,000, £500,000 and £600,000, respectively, assuming the taxpayer is married with two dependent children aged under 11 years; and what were the comparable figures in each of the last four years.

Mr. Moore: The information for a married man with two dependent children is in the table, which assumed that no tax relief or allowance, other than the married man's allowance, is available. Figures have been rounded to the nearest £10.

Net income after tax and child benefit £	Gross Investment Income (£)
	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1985-85
200,000	769,270	769,000	764,790	759,880	475,950
400,000	1,569,270	1,569,000	1,564,790	1,559,880	975,950
500,000	1,969,270	1,969,000	1,964,790	1,959,880	1,225,950
600,000	2,369,270	2,369,000	2,364,790	2,359,880	1,475,950

Taxation

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his estimate of the effect on revenue accruing to the Exchequer of changes in income tax paid at above basic rate, arising only from the change in the tax threshold in each year since 1979;

(2) what was the total amount of revenue accruing to the Exchequer from (a) income tax, (b) investment income surcharge, (c) capital transfer tax, (d) capital gains tax and (e) income tax above the basic rate in each year since 1979 in real terms, calculated at (i) 1979 prices and (ii) 1984 prices;

(3) what is his estimate of the cumulative effect on revenue accruing to the Exchequer of changes in (a) income tax, (b) investment income surcharge, (c) capital transfer tax, (b) capital gains tax and (e) income tax above the basic rate introduced since June 1979;

(4) what is the total amount of revenue expected to accrue to the Exchequer from (a) income tax, (b) investment income surcharge, (c) capital transfer tax, (d) capital gains tax and (e) income tax above the basic rate in the years 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of the cost of the revenue of treating husbands and wives separately in respect of tax relief for mortgage interest payments while retaining the rule that such relief applies only to the taxpayer's only or main residence and to a limit of interest on a £30,000 mortgage on any one house.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 319]: On the assumption that the husband and wife would each be entitled to claim relief for interest on borrowing of up to £30,000 for their only or main residence. The cost would depend on the way in which the total borrowing was divided between them, and I regret that it has not been possible to make a precise calculation. But the cost is likely to be between £50 million and £75 million in 1985-86. If my hon. Friend has a different point in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Pensions

Mr. Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the savings to the Exchequer if pensions of employees of (a) nationalised industries and (b) local authorities were paid as they arose and not through funded schemes, with present funded schemes being frozen.

Mr. Hayhoe: Public expenditure would not be affected by changes in pension schemes for nationalised industry employees because in general these schemes do not involve direct public expenditure. These funds are the responsibility of the industry and the pension fund trustees, and the Government have no responsibility for their operation.

In respect of the local authorities, on the basis that the frozen funds would continue to pay the benefits accrued on past service, there would be an initial saving in the contributions currently paid to the funds. This would diminish as the liability for future service built up and eventually pay-as-you-go would become more expensive because of the lack of pre-funding. The effect on the Exchequer would depend upon the nature of the arrangements made.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of abolishing capital gains tax on (a) assets held before 1979 and (b) held for more than two years.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Personal Allowances

Mr. Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate how many people would be taken out of tax, and at what cost to the Exchequer, if personal allowances were increased by (a) 5 per cent., (b) 10 per cent., (c) 15 per cent. and (d) 20 per cent.

Mr. Moore: Estimates are in the following table. All comparisons are made against indexation of allowances, thresholds and rate bands by 4·6 per cent. in 1985-86.

Increase in personal allowances above indexation (as percentage of 1984-85 levels) (per cent.)	Numbers of taxpayers taken out of tax (thousand)	Direct revenue cost (£ million at forecast 1985-86 income levels)
		1985-86	Full year
5	450	780	975
10	850	1,540	1,915
15	1,260	2,290	2,850
20	1,670	3,040	3,780

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much would be transferred to non-taxpayers if the value of the married personal allowance and the additional personal allowance were used to increase child benefits; and what proportion of that value this transfer represents.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 320]: The estimated yield from the allowance changes would total about £4,240 million at 1984-85 income levels, as detailed in replies I gave to my hon. Friend on 22 January 1985 at column 365. About £150 million of this yield would be extra tax from people who currently have no tax liability. If the whole of the £4,240 million were used to increase child benefit—and the scale rates of supplementary benefit for dependent children by a similar amount—then families with children who currently pay no tax would receive about £600 million, some 14 per cent. of the total. The net benefit to non-taxpayers as a group — including those without children — would therefore be about £450 million.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on the retail price index of a change of 1 per cent. of value added tax on the present range of goods and services now covered by value added tax.

Mr. Hayhoe: A change in the rate of value added tax of one percentage point would have an impact effect on the retail price index of 0·5 per cent.

Tax Havens

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will include in the Finance Bill legislation to limit tax evasion and avoidance through the tax havens of the Isle of Man, Jersey and Guernsey.

Mr. Moore: I have noted the hon. Member's suggestion.

Civil Service (London Weighting Allowances)

Mr. Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the cost to the Exchequer of the London weighting allowances for the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: Approximately £129 million per annum.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the value to (a) a married man on national average earnings with two children aged 5 and 11 years, (b) a married man with the same family on two thirds national average earnings and (c) a married man with the same family on five times national average earnings, from the expenditure of £2 million to either (i) increase child benefit or (ii) raise tax thresholds.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Pension Funds

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the aggregate assets of pension funds in 1957, 1967, 1977, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 593]: Estimates of total assets of pension funds, at end of year, valued at market prices, are as follows:

	£ billion
1957	2·1
*1967	6·6
†1977	28·8
†1982	84·2
†1983	106·2

* Local authority funds within the total were at end-March 1968.
† Net of short-term liabilities and long-term borrowing. Figures for end-1984 are not yet available.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to (a) the absolute value and (b) the percentage share of (i) private sector, (ii) local authority and (iii) other public sector pensions funds in total pension funds in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 592]: Latest figures of the assets* of pension funds valued at market prices are as follows:

	£ billion		per cent. of total
	end-1982	end-1983	end-1982	end-1983
Private sector funds	48·9	62·5	58·0	58·9
Local authority funds	11·4	14·3	13·5	13·4
Other public sector funds	24·0	29·4	28·5	27·7
TOTAL, ALL FUNDS	84·2	106·2	100·0	100·0

* Net of short-term liabilities and long-term borrowing. Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Quoted Shares (Ownership)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the share of (a) trust companies, (b) insurance companies and (c) pension funds in the ownership of total quoted shares in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 593]: Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

The estimated proportions* of total United Kingdom quoted ordinary and preference shares held by the specified financial institutions are as follows:

	end 1982 per cent.	end 1983 per cent.
Trust companies:
Unit trusts	3·7	3·9
Investment trusts	3·5	3·1
Insurance companies	20·4	20·0
Pension funds	29·3	29·3
Total of above institutions	56·9	56·3

* based on holdings valued at market prices.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 592]: Details of the organisations for which the Treasury accounts are contained in the Votes for Economic and Financial Administration Class XIII, 13 and Civil Service Catering Services Class XIII, 14. The charges for the services provided are set to cover costs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will give details of the expected costs of the visit by the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner to Australia and New Zealand; and if he will explain its intended purpose.

Mr. Beith: The estimated costs of the visit are as follows:

Air travel—£10,692
Subsistence—£6,594

Provision in the estimate of up to £1,500 has also been made in the usual way for other contingent costs which may arise, in particular for local travel.

I understand that the purpose of the visit is to complete further inquiries into how appropriate are the restrictions placed upon the Parliamentary Commissioner's jurisdiction by the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967, and in that connection to hold discussions with Commonwealth and State Ombudsmen, Parliamentarians and others about Ombudsman systems, with special reference to jurisdictional matters. The visit has been authorised by the Liaison Committee in accordance with the normal procedure.

Members (Groups Insurance)

Mr. Chapman asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representating the House of Commons Commission, what changes have been made to the hon. Members' group accident insurance arrangements.

Mr. Beith: The death and capital benefits available under the terms of the policy have been increased to £85,000 as from 1 January 1985. I will arrange for the memorandum by the Accountant, which gives details of the cover and exclusions, to be place in the Library.

DEFENCE

General Belgrano

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the signal authorising HMS Conqueror to sink the General Belgrano transmitted via a United States satellite channel was received by HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Stanley: The signal was initially received some time after 3 pm London time, but as it was slightly garbled it was not until after 5 pm that HMS Conqueror reported that she had received and understood the new order. It would not be in the public interest to comment on the channels of communications with submarines.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consequences Her Majesty's Government envisage from a reduction in the number of nuclear weapons in the world.

Mr. Stanley: A safer world, so long as the reductions are balanced, effective and verifiable.

NATO

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Leyton of 29 January, if he will give a breakdown of the increased level of North Atlantic Treaty Organisation infrastructure funding agreed by North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers in December 1984; and if he will give details of the subjects to be covered by the Northern Atlantic Treaty Organisation studies aimed at producing early proposals for improvements to conventional defence.

Mr. Stanley: The funds approved in December 1984 by NATO Defence Ministers for infrastructure will be broken down into six annual programmes to be authorised in the years 1985 to 1990 inclusive. These programmes will include work services items such as airfield facilities and protection, naval base facilities and ammunition storage sites, and equipment such as communications, radar, and command, control and information systems. The precise programme content and project locations, which will range through the member countries of the Alliance, will be determined according to NATO's military priorities. The United Kingdom will contribute about 12 per cent. of the funding. On improvements to conventional defence, I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 8 of the communiqué issued at the end of the Defence Planning Committee meeting in December 1984, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Strategic Nuclear Deterrent Systems

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Defence what alternative strategic nuclear deterrent systems for the United Kingdom other than Trident he has evaluated since 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: None. As described in open government document 80/23 "The Future United Kingdom Strategic Nuclear Deterrent Force" and 82/1 "The United Kingdom Trident Programme", a number of alternative weapons systems were considered before the decision was made to purchase Trident II D5, which the Government believe to be the most cost-effective choice.

Wintex-Cimex 85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the involvement of the home defence system in exercise Wintex-Cimex 85.

Mr. Stanley: Home defence plans and procedures will be tested during Exercise Wintex-Cimex 85. As I said to the hon. Member in my reply to him on 30 November 1984, columns 597-98, details of the scenario for the execise and the play itself are classified.

"New Statesman"

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what reply the Secretary of the D Notice Committee gave to the New Statesman newspaper; and who sought his advice on whether they should publish figures publicly made available by Admiral Lord Lewin pertaining to the operation of Her Majesty's submarines.

Mr. Stanley: Advice was sought by the New Statesman in relation to the article in The Guardian of 28 January concerning the sinking of the Belgrano. Discussions between the secretary of the defence press and broadcasting committee and the press, broadcasting organisations and publishers are regarded as having taken place in confidence.

Home Defence

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the aims of home defence.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the section of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984" on the defence of the United Kingdom, paragraphs 407 to 414.

Directorate General of Defence Accounts

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Defence when copies of the report by Coopers and Lybrand into the Directorate General of Defence Accounts will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Butler: A copy of the report by Coopers and Lybrand into the Directorate General of Defence Accounts has been placed in the House Library today.

Harrier (Navigation System)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will be in a position to declare the outcome of the recent competition for the Royal Air Force Harrier G R mark V inerial navigation system.

Mr. Butler: The contract is to be awarded to Ferranti plc at Edinburgh.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Cell and Organ Culture Tests

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is Her Majesty's Government's policy toward companies offering cell and organ culture tests as an alternative to the use of living animals for assessing the safety of substances.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are advised on the safety of chemical substances by a number of independent expert committees. So that manufacturers and testing laboratories submitting data for assessment may be aware of the most suitable tests, HMSO has published guidelines on testing for carcinogenicity, mutagenicity and toxicity prepared by certain of the committees.

The Government are funding research on safety testing, including the development of cell and organ culture tests as an alternative to animal testing, and welcome the fact that companies are offering such tests if they give useful and reliable information. However, certain animal tests are essential to provide all the data needed if human health and the environment are to be adequately safeguarded.

Elderly Persons (Care)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received from the National Union of Public Employees about care for the elderly.

Mr. John Patten: None.

Oxygen Concentrators

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to improve the supply of oxygen concentrators by arranging for their issue by family practitioner committees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I announced on 3 October 1984 that concentrators would replace cylinders for patients requiring large quantities of oxygen and that they would be supplied through the family practitioner services. Arrangements are being made to implement this decision and we hope that concentrators will be available on the prescription of general practitioners by mid to late summer.

Surrogate Motherhood

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to reach a conclusion concerning legislation to ban surrogate motherhood; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 14 January at column 63.

Benefit (Overpayments)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to ensure that claimants of unemployment or supplementary benefit do not receive overpayment of benefit allocations.

Mr. Whitney: Existing instructions to officials are designed to minimise the risk of overpayment of benefits. These instructions are kept under continuous review.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how he proposes to notify prescribing doctors, including those in hospital employment, dispensing pharmacists and the manufacturing companies of the medicines which will, and will not, be prescribable under the National Health Service from 1 April; and how much time they will then have to consider the information before the proposed date of implementation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We will use our normal and well-established channels of communication to provide the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the pharmaceutical industry with details about the drugs which will cease to be prescribable under the National Health Service from 1 April 1985. We recognise the need to give them as much notice as possible.

Abortions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the total numbers of (a) legal abortion deaths, (b) other abortion deaths and (c) non-abortion maternal deaths in France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Yugoslavia, Hungary and Czechoslovakia in 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and how these figures compare with those for England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland in each of those years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information is not readily available in the exact form requested. However, information from World Health Statistics is given in the table. International comparisons are difficult because of differences in definition. Figures for 1980-1983 are classified on a different basis to those of earlier years.

Numbers and rates per 100,000 live births of abortion deaths and non-abortion maternal deaths in selected countries for 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983

Rheumatology Unit, Truro

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that the rheumatology unit in Truro can satisfy demand for treatment in Cornwall.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health authority plans to improve its rheumatology service by appointing an additional consultant and, as resources allow, by providing a further six inpatient beds at the Truro unit.

Rheumatology

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the ratio of beds available for rheumatology treatment to the number of patients in Cornwall and nationally.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information is as follows:

Rheumatology departments in National Health Service Hospitals 1983

	Average daily number of available beds	In-patient cases	In-patient cases per available bed
Cornwall and Isles of Scilly District Health Authority	17	425	25·0

AIDS

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has issued instructions to district health authorities as to the amount of information to be given to the public when a case of the disease acquired immune deficiency syndrome occurs within the district.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have not felt it necessary to issue such instructions.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he issued instructions to the district health authorities as to the tracing of contacts of persons known to be suffering from the disease acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No instructions have been issued. Medical officers for environmental health have responsibility for local measures to prevent and control the spread of infectious disease. Facilities for identifying sources of infection exist, but local arrangements vary. Recipients of blood of blood products which may have been donated by an individual who subsequently developed AIDS are traced by the blood transfusion service.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Hordern asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer if employers' contributions to the national insurance fund of employers operating solely within the development areas were abolished.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information necessary to answer this question is not available.

Hospitals (Cross-Infection)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence he has of the level of cross-infection within hospitals in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold such information centrally. The public health laboratory service report on the national survey of infection in hospitals, 1980 suggests that there is a 9 per cent. rate of hospital acquired infections amongst inpatients. However, not all such infections are serious or preventable.

State Pensions

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of average workers' earnings the basic state pensions represents; and how this figure compares with other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Whitney: At November 1984 it is provisionally estimated that the state basic retirement pension for a single person represented about 19·2 per cent. of the average gross earnings of all male employees. Comparative estimates for other countries are very difficult to compile and results must be interpreted with a good deal of caution. For example, it is difficult to derive comparable estimates of average earnings between member states of the European community. Published data for average earnings with which pensions are compared may relate to different months, refer to work forces of different compositions, and the definition of gross earnings varies between countries. Moreover a number of technical factors, such as the method of revaluing past earnings, may substantially affect calculations. Additionally, in order to get a fair comparison it is necessary to have information on many other factors, such as the coverage of occupational pension schemes, which play widely differing roles from country to country, protection for women with limited work records, the level of social assistance for those with inadequate contributory pension rights and the effect on pensioners of housing, pharmaceutical and medical treatment costs.

Subject to these qualifications, the latest information readily available is set out in the table. It is based on earnings information obtained through official contacts and state pensions information derived from "Tables of Social Benefits Systems in the member states of the European countries, Portugal and Spain, the position at 1 January 1984" (a copy of which is in the Library).

Notes:

* Pensions in France, Belgium and Germany and partly in Denmark and the United Kingdom, are calculated at award upon previous earnings revalued in line with increases in average earnings: if an individual's earnings have not been at least equal to average earnings over the qualifying period the percentage figures above will over estimate the value of the old age pension.

Ambulance Service (Northern Region)

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the genuine 999 calls received by the northern region ambulance service in 1984 were dealt with within his Department's recommended emergency response time standard (Orcom standards).

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this detailed local information centrally.

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many ambulance stations there were in the northern region ambulance service in December 1984; and what are the projected figures for 1985, 1986 and 1987;

(2) how many emergency ambulance vehicles were available in the northern region ambulance service in (a) December 1983 and (b) December 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect centrally information on the numbers of ambulances and ambulance stations. The following figures are derived from statistics compiled by the York district health authority.

	1982-83		1983-84
	Ambulances	Ambulance Stations	Ambulances	Ambulance Stations

Projections for future years are the responsibility of the relevant managing health authorities.

* Including Northumbria Ambulance Service

† Including 334 emergency ambulances

‡ Including 211 emergency ambulances

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many ambulance men were in the employ of the northern region ambulance service in (a) December 1983 and (b) December 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest available information, in the form requested by the hon. Member, is at 30 September 1983. At that time, 1,279 ambulance men/women were employed within the northern region and of these, 570 were employed by the Northumbria ambulance service. Later figures are not yet available to this level of detail.

The total numbers of staff employed by the ambulance services (that is, including ambulance officers and control assistants) within the Northern region were as follows:

Date	Number
September 1983	1,480
December 1983	1,470
March 1984	1,450
June 1984	1,430
September 1984*	1,420

* Provisional.

All these figures are whole time equivalents.

Hospitals (Private Contractors)

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what hospitals in the area covered by northern region employ private contractors; what services they provide; what guidelines exist to monitor their performance in laundry cleaning; and whether any private contractors have had their contracts terminated or not renewed because of poor standards of work.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have issued guidance to health authorities on competitive tendering including the need to monitor the performance of contractors. We do not collect centrally the detailed local information requested by the hon. Member.

South Tyneside Health Authority

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total of annual fees, emoluments or expenses paid to the chairman and vice chairman of the South Tyneside district health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No remuneration as such is paid to chairmen, vice-chairman or members of health authorities. Regional and district chairmen do however receive an honorarium, currently £8,424 a year. The conditions under which expenses may be claimed and the current rates payable are set out in the National Health Service and English and Welsh National Boards for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting (Travelling Allowances, etc) Determination 1983, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. For detailed information, the hon. Member may care to contact the health authority direct.

Doctors (Prescribing Habits)

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what records of individual general practitioners' prescribing habits and drug costs exist; who holds them; for how many years they have existed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Records of individual general practitioner's prescribing habits and drug costs have been held by our Department since the early years of the National Health Service. The Prescription Pricing Authority prepares every year for every family practitioner committee, an analysis of all prescriptions written by general practitioners in the FPC area during a sample month. A summary of this analysis is sent to every general practitioner in the area together with the statistics relating to his or her individual prescribing. The general practitioner is then able to see how his or her prescribing compares with that of colleagues in the area. More detailed analyses are prepared on doctors whose prescribing costs are significantly higher than the local average.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the proposal to extend the use of postal claim forms for supplementary benefit.

Mr. Newton: I am pleased to be able to announce that we shall shortly start offering to retirement pensioners and other people wishing to claim supplementary benefit the opportunity to make their claim by post. They will have this option in addition to the present system of home visit or DHSS office interview. All DHSS offices will offer a postal method to those people who want it by the end of May 1985.

Our decision to offer this new choice follows a careful pilot study last year, which itself followed the successful introduction of postal claiming for unemployed claimants to supplementary benefit from December 1982. The pilot study produced no sign of a reduction in claims or of unacceptable error rates in processing them. An independent study by Social Community Planning Research found that many claimants felt that they would prefer to claim by post, and the Social Security Advisory Committee have welcomed the proposal.

The forms used in the pilot study worked well, but are being further improved in the light of detailed points which emerged, and of suggestions by the Social Security Advisory Committee. In particular they will express as clearly as possible that postal claiming is a matter of choice for these groups; that the other options remain open; and that personal help will continue to be available, for example to those for whom English is not the first language.

Extension of the postal claiming option is expected to result in a small staff saving, perhaps of about 60, but in the first 18 months or so more than half of these will be used to monitor the arrangements to ensure that they result in the improvement we seek.

ASH (Scottish Committee Grant)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what public funds from his Department are paid in the current year to Scottish Action on Smoking and Health; and how this compares with each of the last 10 years.

Mr. John MacKay: I have been asked to reply.

The Scottish Home and Health Department's grant to the Scottish committee of Action on Smoking and Health in the current financial year is £23,100. Figures for past years are:

1975-76	800
1976-77	1,700
1977-78	1,500
1978-79	1,400

1980-81	*11,000
1981-82	15,400
1982-83	20,500
1983-84	22,000

* Prior to 1980-81 the Scottish committee also received grant from the Scottish Health Education Group (then Unit).

Cancer (Cumbria)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will retabulate the wards in table 2.18 of the Black report, ranking them by probability using a poisson distribution, and identify those wards on the Cumbrian coast; and if he will make a statement on the differences in ranking obtained by using probability and not rate of incidence as used in table 2.18 of the Black report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 225]: The identity of the wards quoted in tables 2.18 and 2.19 are as follows, with the poisson probability ranking order also shown:

Ward Rank and Details in order of incidence	Wards Rank in order of Poisson Probability

Benefits

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people of working age claimed supplementary benefit for 12 months and more in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the west midlands and (c) the Walsall borough area in May 1979; and if he will give the latest figures for the three groups and the percentage difference in each case.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 31 January 1985, c. 304]: It is regretted that information is not available for the west midlands and the Walsall borough area. Nor is information available for May 1979.

The latest information available is as follows:

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef

27. Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tons of beef sold into intervention in Northern Ireland during 1984 were (a) stored within Northern Ireland and (b) transhipped and stored outside Northern Ireland.

Mr. MacGregor: In 1984 about 16,000 tonnes of intervention beef were taken into store in Northern Ireland and 20,000 tonnes shipped for storage in Great Britain.

Packaging Date Stamps

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all food products other than pre-packed eggs where the packaging date is required to be stamped.

Mr. MacGregor: There are none.

Because of the unique nature of the product, the grading, packaging and marketing of eggs are subject to separate rules embodied in the Egg Marketing Standards Regulations of the European Community. These regulations have always required that egg pre-packs should carry an indication of the period of packaging to safeguard consumers against buying stale eggs. Until 1 December 1984 such indication had to be given by a coded week number. From that date it has been possible, and after 1 July 1985 it will be mandatory, to replace the coded week number by an "open" date of packaging.

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the EEC Commission's proposal that all pre-packed eggs should be stamped with the date of packaging; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: We received a number of representations last year from trade interests about the amendments to the Egg Marketing Standards Regulations which allow the sell-by date to be printed on egg packs as an optional extra in addition to the mandatory marking of the date of packaging. There was some concern that it might not be practical to mark both dates on pre-packs. But such technical problems now seem to have been resolved.

EC (Food Stocks)

Mr. Proctor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current levels of surplus food stocks in existence within the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) on 14 January 1985 at column 30.

Potatoes

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tons of new potatoes were imported between 1 June and 1 July for the years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84; and what percentage of the total United Kingdom markets between these dates these figures represent.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

	Imports of New Potatoes (Tonnes)	Imports as percentage of total United Kingdom market in potatoes in the same period Per cent.
June 1981	97,000	24·7
June 1982	109,000	28·8
June 1983	117,000	22·7
June 1984	83,000	22·3

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tons of processed new potatoes were imported in the years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mr. MacGregor: Separate figures are not available for imports of processed new potatoes.

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total consumption of processed potatoes in the United Kingdom in the years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mr. MacGregor: Total consumption, both inside and outside the home, of processed potatoes in the United Kingdom in the years stated was as follows:

	Tonnes (raw equivalent)
1980-81	1,236,000
1981-82	1,371,000
1982-83	1,558,000
1983-84	1,613,000

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total volume of imports of processed potatoes for the years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mr. MacGregor: The total volume of United Kingdom imports of processed potatoes in the years state was as follows:

	Tonnes (raw equivalent)
1980-81	149,000
1981-82	254,000
1982-83	345,000
1983-84	411,000

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what steps he has taken and proposes to take to control the quality of imported new potatoes;

(2) what steps he has taken and proposes to take to control the quality of imported maincrop potatoes.

Mr. MacGregor: Following a comprehensive examination of the feasibility of extending quality controls to imported potatoes I have concluded that it would prove very difficult to take action.

Our approach would have to be piecemeal as there is no single piece of legislation which we could apply to cover imports of all potatoes. Moreover, the introduction of legislative measures would almost certainly carry with it the threat of Community legal challenge. To avoid challenge we should have to proceed on the basis of the lowest standard obtaining in other member states of the Community which would not necessarily help our growers.

Discussions with the Potato Marketing Board and the farmers' unions are continuing.

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what were the quota acreages of first early potatoes approved by the Potato Marketing Board for 1983-84 and 1984-85;

(2) what is the quota acreage of first early potatoes approved for planting by the Potato Marketing Board for 1984-85.

Mr. MacGregor: This is a matter for the Potato Marketing Board.

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the anticipated yield, in tons of first early potatoes resulting from the increase in approved quota acreage for 1984-85.

Mr. MacGregor: The allocation of quotas is a matter for the Potato Marketing Board. The special arrangements for the allocation of additional grants of quota to assist growers of first early potatoes will not enter into effect until the 1985 crop season.

Mr. Gale asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total domestic production of processed potatoes for the years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, and 1983-84.

Mr. MacGregor: Total domestic production of processed potatoes in the years stated was as follows:

	tonnes (raw equivalent)
1980-81	1,125,000
1981-82	1,158,000
1982-83	1,252,000
1983-84	1,252,000

Nuclear Attack (Farm Wardens)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give further information on the functions of farm wardens after a nuclear attack, the areas to be served by such wardens, and the sources from which such people might be drawn.

Mrs. Fenner: The function of farm wardens would be to link the farming community and the wartime agricultural departments by conveying information about the state of agriculture and its problems in the area concerned and advice and instructions about the action to be taken. Each warden would serve 20 or so farms, depending on the topography of the area. The wardens would be selected from persons already familiar with the farms and farming in their area and could be one of the farmers in the area or others appropriately qualified such as, for example, those holding positions in agriculturally related enterprises or organisations.

North-East Coast Drift Fishery

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many people are employed in the north-east coast drift fishery.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not have detailed information on the numbers of people employed in this fishery and the ancillary industries. I am consulting the water authorities concerned and will write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many salmon were taken in the north-east coast drift fishery for each of the last five years.

Mr. MacGregor: The total catches of salmon recorded in the Northumbrian and Yorkshire water authority areas by both drift nets and inshore nets were:

	Number
1979	43,464
1980	45,790
1981	69,124
1982	50,167
1983	77,277

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many licences were issued for the taking of salmon in the north-east coast drift fishery for each of the last five years.

Mr. MacGregor: The information for the last five years for which final figures are available is as follows:

	Number
1979	163
1980	158
1981	153
1982	154
1983	154

In some cases these licences cover the use of inshore nets as well as drift nets.

Mr. Soames asked the Minster of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will be bringing forward plans to curtail the taking of salmon in the north-east coast drift fishery.

Mr. MacGregor: As I said in reply to my hon. Friend on 24 January, we are reviewing the management arrangements in this fishery and will announce our conclusions when we have completed the review.

Veterinary Inspection Centre, Northamptonshire

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has now reached a decision on the future of the Veterinary Inspection Centre at Moulton, Northamptonshire.

Mr. Jopling: At this stage I cannot add to the reply which I gave my hon. Friend on 6 December.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Aid Programme

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will itemise the expenditure of the overseas aid programme during 1984; and how this compares with his proposals for 1985.

Mr. Raison: The breakdown of expenditure for 1984 calendar year is not yet available. Figures for 1983 are published in "British Overseas Aid 1985", copies of which are retained in the House of Commons Library. Information for financial year 1985-86 will be contained in the Main Estimates to be presented to Parliament in March.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all aid given by the United Kingdom to each country in central and south America in each of the last five years; and if he will list in each case whether the aid was provided (a) directly, (b) through an international organisation or (c) unconditionally.

Mr. Raison: Aid from Her Majesty's Government to countries in central and south America is provided either directly or through international organisations. 1983 is the latest year for which figures are available. Details of multilateral aid attributable to the United Kingdom are available for 1980-82 only at this stage.

Gross British aid through bilateral and multilateral channels was as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Additional Costs Allowance

Mr. Eggar asked the Lord Privy Seal what representations he has received from hon. Members with regard to the additional costs allowance.

Mr. Biffen: A number of hon. Members have approached me in recent months on the question of whether mortgage interest payments should be allowable against this allowance which is governed by the resolution of the House dated 20 December 1971.

In claiming this allowance the responsibility is upon hon. Members to satisfy themselves that any moneys claimed have been necessarily incurred in pursuance of their Parliamentary duties and that they met all the other requirements set out in the resolution. After further consultations, I have been advised that there is no reason why Members should not claim mortgage interest payments against this allowance so long as the above conditions are met.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Bodies

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what is, for each organisation covered by the publication "Public Bodies 1984" (a) the number of persons paid by public funds and the total number of all such persons and (b) the number of persons paid from public funds who are involved in those organisations listed in part (3) of the introduction as being excluded from "Public Bodies 1984"; and what was the cost of each organisation in (a) and (b) and the overall cost.

The Prime Minister: It is not possible to give all the information requested from material held centrally, and it would be disproportionately costly to provide information which is readily available on an itemised basis. Detailed information on both costs and numbers for the organisations concerned can, however, be obtained from Public Bodies 1984 (which gives staff numbers, expenditure, and public funding of National Health Service authorities and executive bodies), "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428), Supply Estimatee, "Local Government Financial Statistics in England and Wales", the annual article in "Economic Trends", "Employment in the Public and Private Sectors" and from annual reports.

In category (a) the total number of people employed by NHS authorities and executive bodies which are wholly or partly financed by public funds is some 1,222,000. Advisory bodies and tribunals are generally staffed by sponsoring Departments and staff are therefore covered in central Government manpower totals. The 1,584,000 staff of nationalised industries and public corporations are paid by the bodies concerned, not from public funds, although some of these bodies receive money voted by Parliament.

In category (b) the organisations whose staff are paid from public are central Government Departments, the general criminal and civil court system, and local authorities. The total number of these staff (excluding staff paid from trading funds and bodies controlled by local authorities) is some 2,895,000.

GCHQ, Cheltenham

Mrs Renée Short asked the Prime Minister what discussions were held with the Council of Civil Service Unions prior to the introduction of the polygraph test at the Government communications headquarters.

The Prime Minister: The Government accepted the Security Commission's recommendation, following its inquiry into the case of Geoffrey Arthur Prime, that a pilot scheme should be undertaken in the Security Service and at the Government Communications Headquarters to test the feasibility of polygraph security screening in the intelligence and security agencies. The Head of the Home Civil Service held discussions with representatives of the Council of Civil Service Unions on two occasions before the pilot scheme began. No decision on whether the polygraph should be introduced as part of security screening in the intelligence and security agencies will be taken until the results of the pilot scheme have been evaluated.

Civil Service (Manpower)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister if she will break down by Department the reductions in Civil Service numbers achieved in each year since 1979.

The Prime Minister: Figures can be obtained from the following documents:

(i) 1982-83 and 1983-84: Annual Reports from the Treasury to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee:
(ii) 1981-82: First Special Report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee 1982-83 (House of Commons Paper No. 46);
(iii) 1980-81: Seventh Report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee 1980-81 (House of Commons Paper No. 423);
(iv) 1979-80: Summaries of the Civil Service Quarterly Staff Returns. All these documents are available in the House of Commons Library. Figures for 1984-85 are not yet available.

Ministerial Cars (Parking Offences)

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister, of the parking offences committed by ministerial car drivers in 1984, how many penalties were met by the Government car service.

The Prime Minister: All the penalties incurred during 1984 were met by the Government car service.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Nellist asked the Prime Minister how many Sri Lankan service personnel are currently attending training courses in the United Kingdom; how many attended such courses in each of the last three years; and if she will give a breakdown between the services providing the training.

The Prime Minister: A small number of Sri Lankan students attend military training courses in the United Kingdom each year. It is not our practice to reveal details of such training since this information is confidential between Governments.

Nuclear Power Stations (Electricity Generation)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Prime Minister whether it continues to be the policy of Her Majesty's Government that all civil nuclear power stations and establishments in the United Kingdom should be operated in a manner which optimises the production of electricity.

The Prime Minister: The power stations of the CEGB and SSEB are operated to optimise the production of electricity. Research reactors in the civil nuclear programmes are operated to extend the understanding of nuclear power.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what would be (a) the loss of revenue if tax and national insurance thresholds were raised to £3,250 per year for a single person and £4,250 for a married couple with an additional tax allowance of £780 for each child in 1985-86 and (b) the saving in expenditure if all benefits, including child benefit, for those in full-time work were abolished in 1985-86; and if she will also estimate the net weekly spending power of a man with a wife and two children whose gross wages are £110 per week, given the assumptions in the tax/benefit model tables November 1984, if each of the above changes were introduced simultaneously.

The Prime Minister: The information required is as follows:

(a) The cost of increasing the single pension tax allowance to £3,250, the married man's allowance to £4,259 and of introducing child tax allowances of £780 per child is estimated at about £9·5 billion in a full year at 1985-86 levels of income, as compared with statutory indexation of personal allowances. The estimated reduction in national insurance contributions if the lower earnings limit was raised to £3,250 per year for single people and to £4,250 per year for married couples, in relation to their joint earnings, is £1·2 billion in 1985-86. This estimate assumes no change in the contracted-out rebate in respect of people remaining liable to contributions.

(b) The estimated saving in expenditure in 1985-86 if child benefit, family income supplement and housing benefit were abolished for those in full-time work is £3·8 billion.

After the changes specified the net weekly spending power of a married man with two children whose gross earnings were £110 a week would be £71·50.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what would be the cost of raising tax and national insurance thresholds for 1985-86 to £3,500 for a single person and £5,000 for a married couple, with an additional tax allowance of £780 per child, and the saving in expenditure and the revenue benefit, by abolishing all social security benefits for those in work and abolishing mortgage tax relief, assuming current interest rates, for 1985-86; and if she will estimate the effect of these changes on the net weekly spending power of a married man with two children, man working only, with a gross wage of £125 a week (a) paying rent and rates with assumptions laid out in tax/benefit model tables and (b) with a mortgage of (i) £20,000, (ii) £25,000 and (iii) £30,000, assuming average levels of rates.

The Prime Minister: The cost of increasing the single person's tax allowance to £3,500, the married man's tax allowance to £5,000 and of introducing child tax allowances of £780 per child is estimated at about £12·5 billion in a full year at 1985-86 levels of income, as compared with statutory indexation of personal allowances.

The estimated reduction in national insurance contributions if the lower earnings limit was raised to £3,500 per year for single people and to £5,000 per year for married couples, in relation to their joint earnings is about £1·5 billion in 1985-86. This estimate assumes no change in the contracted-out rebate in respect of people remaining liable to contributions.

The estimated saving in expenditure in 1985-86 from abolishing child benefit, family income supplement and housing benefit for those in full-time work is £3·8 billion. The yield from abolishing mortgage interest relief in 1985-86 would be about £4 billion on assumptions of no change in interest rates and levels of mortgage lending.

The table shows the effect of these changes on the current net weekly spending power of a married man, with two children aged four and six, whose gross earnings are £125 a week, and with the specified rent-mortgage commitments. Although it illustrates the effects of these particular assumptions the table has no general application. Such levels of mortgage would not be consistent with normal building society policy of relating the size of loan to the mortgagor's gross income.

Net weekly spending power of a married man, with two children aged four and six, whose gross earnings are £125 a week

	Current position	Position after changes outlined above
(a) Rent of £15·60 a week	83·82	85·15
(b) Mortgage of
(i) £20,000	65·15	50·75
(ii) £25,000	56·40	38·25
(iii) £30,000	47·65	25·75

Assumptions:

1. Mortgages are in their first year.
2. Mortgage capital repayments are ignored.
3. Mortgage interest rate is 13 per cent.
4. Mortgage tax relief is given at source.
5. General rates are £5·85 and water rate £1·50 a week in all examples.
6. Except for the changes specified all other assumptions are as in the November 1984 DHSS tax/benefit model tables.

Security Vetting (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Maginnis asked the Prime Minister if she has transferred to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry responsibility for the operation of the Royal Ulster Constabulary special branch in relation to security vetting of British Telecom employees in Northern Ireland; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

Tigre

Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister what response is to be made by Her Majesty's Government to the request of 4 February by the Relief Society of Tigre for international action on the present famine by way of a massive escalation of emergency aid, including food and transport.

The Prime Minister: The Government will continue to provide substantial relief directly and through voluntary agencies to all parts of Ethiopia and to encourage international action to this end.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Administration Costs

Mr. Proctor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the cost of administration of his Department expressed in constant prices in each of the last five years.

Mr. Jopling: The total cost of administration for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food expressed in 1983-84 prices* in the last five years was:

	£ million
1979-80	194
1980-81	208
1981-82	199
1982-83	197
1983-84	203

This information is based on the Annual Scrutinies of Departmental Running Costs. The introduction on 1 April 1983 of full cost repayment to the Property Services Agency for accommodation added an extra £6 million to running costs in 1983-84 compared with 1982-83.

Corresponding figures for the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce are:

	£ million

1980-81	10
1981-82	10
1982-83	12
1983-84	13

Lupin Grain

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what date and for what purpose the introduction of a subsidy for the production of lupin grain was authorised by the EEC Council of Ministers.

Mr. MacGregor: An aid scheme for the inclusion of lupins in animal feeds was introduced with effect from 1 July 1984 in order to reduce the Community's dependence on imported protein and to encourage producers to switch out of crops that are in surplus.

Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operatives

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the savings (a) in 1984-85 and (b) in a full year resulting from the changes in the rates of grant for agricultural and horticultural co-operatives.

Mr. MacGregor: If demand is at the level currently expected the revised rates would produce estimated savings of about £0·3 million in a full year. No savings from these changes are expected in 1984-85.

Grain (Costs)

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing for each year since 1977 expenditue on (a) capital grants other than for the storage and drying of grain, (b) capital grants for the storage and drying of grain and (c) other grants made under the agricultural and horticultural co-operation scheme expressed in terms (i) of current prices and (ii) of constant prices.

Mr. MacGregor: I regret that the information could be provided in the form requested only at disproportionate cost. However the following information shows the amount and categories of grant recommendations made to Ministers by Food From Britain and its predecessor the Central Council for Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation.

Note: The figures are in current price terms. Constant prices cannot be calculated because sufficient detail of the elements in individual investments is not available. The figures in brackets show how the level of recommendations has moved in relation to changes in the Retail Price Index.

ENERGY

Coal Firing Scheme

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many applications were received for assistance under the coal firing scheme in each of the years 1983 and 1984.

Mr. David Hunt: In 1983, 371 applications were received for assistance under the coal firing scheme. In 1984, 190 applications were received.

EMPLOYMENT

Methyl Isocyanate

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 21 January, Official Report, column 283, whether any of the four places where methyl isocyanate is stored for research purposes in the United Kingdom is in Wales.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No.

MSC Staff (Leave)

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to secure the withdrawal of the directive by the Manpower Services Commission that its staff cannot take annual leave to lobby their Member of Parliament on Tuesday 12 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: Individual members of staff are in general entirely free subject only to normal operational requirements, to use their annual leave to go and see their Member of Parliament. However, it is established practice in the Civil Service under successive Governments, not to grant annual leave to staff to take part in an organised lobby clearly forming part of an overall campaign of protest, which has already included industrial action.

Clothing Industry

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment to what extent employment in the clothing manufacturing sectors of north-east England has declined since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The only available information is for the period from June 1978 to September 1981 when censuses of employment were taken. In that period there was a decline of 32 per cent., from 21,800 in 1978 to 14,800 in 1981, in the number of employees employed in the clothing manufacturing industries of north-east England.

Censuses of employment have been taken triennially since 1978 and the results of the current, September 1984, census are scheduled to become available in the autumn.

Adult Training

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what resources he plans to make available to the Manpower Services Commission to enable it to increase the numbers of participants on its adult training programmes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Through more cost-effective use of resources and tailoring provision to meet specific needs, we intend to achieve this increase within the current level of expenditure on adult training. Forward provision for occupational and adult training programmes (excluding the Commission's expenditure on non-advanced further education) is £262 million in 1985-86 (excluding administration costs).

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list all the nationalised industries, non-governmental organisations and agencies for which his Department either has responsibility or provides funding, as well as those sections of his Department, which provide services to the general public or to private organisations; and if he will indicate separately those which at present (a) charge no fees, (b) charge fees which do not fully cover the costs of providing those services, (c) charge fees which exactly cover the costs of providing those services and (d) charge fees which more than cover the costs of providing those services.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c. 587]: The Department of Employment provides funding for the Manpower Services Commission, the Advisory, conciliation and Arbitration Service, and the Health and Safety Commission, with its executive arm the Health and Safety Executive, which, together with the Department itself, form the DE group.

On the matter of services to the general public and private organisations, I list for the DE Group, the services whose full cost exceed £100,000 per annum.

(a) No fees are charged for a large number of services provided in respect of the DE Group's statutory functions. the major services are:—
1. Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.
2. Advice and information provided by the Health and Safety Executive on health and Safery matters.
3. Industrial Tribunals and Employment Appeal Tribunals.
4. Race Relations Employment Advisory Service.
5. Jobcentre service.
6. Employment Rehabilitation.
7. Services to Disabled People.
8. Sheltered Employment Procurement and Consultancy Service.

(b) The services for which fees are charged which do not fully cover the costs are:—
1. Sponsored Training.
2. Mobile Instructor Service.
3. Industrial Language Training.

(c) The services for which fees are charged which are set exactly to cover the costs are:—
1. Testing and Research work carried out by the Research and Laboratories Division of the Health and Safety Executive (HSE).
2. Employment Medical Advisory Service provided by HSE.
3. Professional and Executive Recruitment Service.
4. Training within Industry.
5. Careers and Occupational Information Centre.
6. Training for overseas students.
7. Training for Redundant Steel Workers.
8. Instructor Training Colleges.

(d) The services for which fees are charged which at present more than cover the costs are:—
Licensing of Employment Agencies.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Importuning

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the number of prosecutions for importuning in the street which have been brought in each of the last five years in (a) the Metropolitan police district and (b) the rest of England and Wales; and in how many of these cases the prosecution's evidence was supported in court by the offended man or woman.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is given in the following table. Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available. Information collected centrally on court proceedings does not include details of how the prosecution evidence was presented.

Persons proceeded against for offences of importuning under section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 or section 1 of the Street Offences Act 1959 by area.

England and Wales	831	10,669

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the most recent guidance which he has given to the police for dealing with the arrest of men suspected of importuning.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis issued a force order in October 1984 to give greater prominence in the context of plain clothes operations to the existing principle laid down in paragraph 1.92 of the Home Office consolidated circular to the police on crime and kindred matters (a copy of which is in the Library of the House) that no member of a police force should counsel, incite or procure the commission of a criminal offence. The new order lays down that officers of the uniformed branch selected for duties in plain clothes must always be briefed by a senior officer to ensure that they avoid behaviour which could give rise to legitimate accusations that they had acted as agents provacateurs, as defined by the Royal Commission on Police Powers in 1928. The Royal Commission defined an agent provocateur as a person who entices another to commit an express breach of the law which he would not otherwise have committed and then proceeds or informs against him in respect of such an offence. HM Inspectors of Constabulary are drawing this new order to the attention of other chief officers of police.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations or complaints he has received during the past 12 months concerning the policy of different police forces throughout the country in dealing with kerb-crawling and importuning; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have received representations about the enforcement of section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 by officers of the Metropolitan Police and of one provincial police force. We have also received some representations of a general nature relating to the enforcement by the police of the law in relation to prostitution. As to male importuning, I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given today to his question concerning guidance to the police. As to kerb-crawling, the Government welcome the Sexual Offences Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) which will enable more effective action to be taken.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received any recent reports from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and other chief constables concerning the problem of kerb-crawling; whether chief constables made any recommendations or proposals in their reports on these matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The Association of Chief Police Officers and the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis submitted comments and proposals to the Criminal Law Revision Committee following publication of the Committee's working paper on offences relating to prostitution and allied offences. These comments were taken into account by the Committee when preparing its 16th report (Cmnd. 9329), on which the relevant provisions of the Sexual Offences Bill are based.

Subsequently, as the answer given today to another Question by my hon. Friend makes clear, we have been in correspondence with the Association and the Commissioner concerning the Bill.

My right hon. and learned Friend has also received, separately, a report from the chief constable of Merseyside, who has emphasised the inadequacies of the present law and who welcomes the prospect of new legislation.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with chief constables and others on the question of kerb-crawling in connection with the Sexual Offences Bill; what conclusion he has drawn from these discussions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have kept the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis fully informed of developments on the Sexual Offences Bill, and have received helpful suggestions from them which we are considering. The general conclusion which we have drawn is that the police welcome the prospect of new legislation which will enable them to respond more effectively to pressure to deal with kerb-crawlers.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from interested organisations on the question of kerb-crawling in relation the Sexual Offences Bill; if he will list those organisations in the Official Report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Numerous comments from organisations on the subject of kerb-crawling were submitted to the Criminal Law Revision Committee during the course of its review of the law on prostitution. The organisations which gave evidence to the Committee are listed in its 16th Report, "Prostitution in the Street" (Cmnd. 9329).

We have ourselves received a considerable number of representations in favour of more effective action against kerb-crawling, including representations from hon. Members.

Since the Sexual Offences Bill was introduced, we have received comments from the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Metropolitan Police, the National Association of Probation Officers, the Whalley Range Association and the Prosecuting Solicitors' Society. All these organisations acknowledge the extent of the nuisance caused by kerb-crawling. The National Association of Probation Officers expresses wide reservations about the Bill; others offer detailed comments.

Asylum

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost of providing a written record of all interviews by his Department's interviewing officers with applicants for asylum.

Mr. Waddington: An unsuccessful applicant for asylum is already given brief reasons for the refusal of his application at the time of refusal. If the applicant has a right of appeal and exercises it, a full explanatory statement is prepared setting out the reasons for refusal in detail. It is difficult to estimate the additional costs of giving fuller reasons at the time of refusal without undertaking a practice trial. It is planned to undertake such a trial in respect of cases where there is no right of appeal, when resources permit.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost of providing unsuccessful applicants for asylum with a written statement of the reasons for refusal.

Mr. Waddington: All interviews with applicants for asylum are recorded in writing. It is difficult to estimate the additional cost of making interview reports available to applicants without practical trials to determine how much extra work would be involved in checking and revising the reports.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost of tape recording all interviews by his Department's interviewing officers with applicants for asylum.

Mr. Waddington: No estimates have been made. Consideration is not being given to the possible use of tape recorders in immigration interviews in this country in advance of the review by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office of their possible use in interviews by entry clearance officers abroad.

Prevention of Terrorism

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the statistics on the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism Act for the latest quarter are available.

Mr. Brittan: Statistics on the operation of the Prevention of Terorism Act in the fourth quarter of 1984 were published in Home Office statistical bulletin issue 1/85, on 30 January 1985.

Anti-police Progaganda

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to counter anti-police propaganda in London and elsewhere; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am confident that the great majority of people fully support the police, and therefore they will continue to ignore anti-police propaganda, but Ministers will continue to express their support for the police on all appropriate occasions.

Prisons (AIDS)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what investigations he intends to conduct on a nationwide basis into the possibility of acquired immune deficiency syndrome symptoms in prisons;

(2) when he expects the investigation into acquired immune deficiency syndrome at Chelmsford and Bullwood Hall prisons, which is being pursued by the communicable disease surveillance centre, to be concluded and its findings to be published.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) on 7 February at column 657. There are no suspected cases of AIDS at either establishment. The role of the centre for the surveillance of communicable diseases has been to offer general advice about the disease to the director of the prison medical service and the district medical officer. We are considering what steps need to be taken in the prison system as a whole in the light of this case and will make a further statement in due course.

Iraq (Diplomats)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make an inquiry into the alleged activities of Iraqi security agents in the United Kingdom;

(2) what representation he has received alleging illegal activities of Iraqi security forces in the United Kingdom; what action he has taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I have received a number of letters making allegations that the Iraqi embassy is behind acts of violence against opponents of the Iraqi Government living in the United Kingdom. These reports have been referred to the police for their consideration but I understand that they have so far been unable to find any firm evidence that embassy officials are involved.

Dr. Emad Hamoudi

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the Thames Valley constabulary on the investigation into the injuries caused to Dr. Emad Hamoudi who was found beside the M4 on 21 January; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Brittan: I have already received a report from Thames valley police on their initial investigations into injuries caused to Dr. Emad Hamoudi on 8 January 1985. The police inquiries are continuing, but I understand that the police have no evidence to suggest that this incident was politically motivated.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Fraud Prosecutions

Mr. Park asked the Attorney-General if he issues guidelines to the Director of Public Prosecutions as to the criteria to be used in deciding whether to prosecute in fraud cases; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No. I meet the Director of Public Prosecutions regularly to discuss the work of his Department. The scope of those discussions includes the handling of fraud cases generally as well as the operation of the newly established fraud investigation groups and individual cases of particular difficulty or importance. The guidelines as to the criteria for prosecution which I published in March 1983 are of general application and no advantage would be gained by the issue of formal guidelines relating to specific categories of criminal offences.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General how many cases in 1984 involving persons injured by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland have been considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland; and what action was taken in each case.

The Attorney-General: Figures for cases considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland involving persons killed or injured by the alleged use of baton rounds in 1984 are as follows:

	Number
Cases	12
Person injured	13
Persons killed	0
Prosecution directed	0
No prosecution directed	6

In six cases a final direction pends the outcome of other proceedings or the submission to the director of additional evidence.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rosebank House, Donaghee

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the existing front boundary wall to the rear of the pavement which is within the curtilage of Rosebank house, Millisle road, Donaghee, is part of a listed building.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am advised that the boundary wall is no longer a part of the property which was listed in 1976.

It would be a matter for the courts to decide whether the wall still forms part of the listed building.

Wild Animals

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will extend the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976 to Northern Ireland or introduce an Order in Council for Northern Ireland with similar effect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No.

Community Physicians

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number of community physicians in the training grades, registrar and senior registrar, within the Western health and social services board.

Mr. Chris Patten: Trainee community physicians usually spend time in more than one health and social services board during their training. At present one registrar is based in the Western board, and no senior registrars.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will detail the projected establishment of community physicians in the Eastern health and social services board for each of the next three years; and how many community physicians currently in post have passed the normal age of retirement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No specific projected establishment of community physicians has been determined for the Eastern health and social services board. It is recognised however that the present number needs to be increased and this will be done as suitable fully trained applicants become available. No community physicians employed by the Eastern board are past the age of retirement.

Republic of Ireland (Civil Servants)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if civil servants employed by the public service of the Republic of Ireland are operating from social security offices administered by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No.

Social Security Fraud

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the recent agreement between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland to prevent social security fraud.

Mr. Chris Patten: I last met my counterpart from the Republic of Ireland on 19 April 1984 when, among the various matters discussed, we reviewed progress on the control of social security fraud involving claimants on both sides of the border. There is no more recent agreement but the high level of co-operation between social security offices in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland continues.

Emergency Provisions (Arrests)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many people were detained in the most recent full calendar year under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978; and how many were charged with scheduled offences under that Act and other Acts;

(2) in respect of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, for the most recent full calendar year, what was the yearly total of arrests made under the Act; and how many persons arrested under the Act were detained for the following periods: (a) up to 12 hours, (b) 12 to 24 hours, (c) 24 to 36 hours, (d) 36 to 48 hours, (e) 48 to 60 hours and (f) 60 to 72 hours, indicating those numbers (i) not ultimately charged under the Act and released, (ii) those charged under the Act and (iii) those charged with an offence but not under the Act, indicating which offences, and (iv) those charged under the Act but not initially detained under the Act.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Prevention of Terrorism Act

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the statistics on the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism Act for the latest quarter are available.

Mr. Scott: The Northern Ireland statistics for the last quarter of 1984 were published on 24 January and copies have been placed in the Library.

Security Statistics

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the security statistics for 1984 are now available, together with details of persons charged with terrorist-type offences and convictions for scheduled offences for that year.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Prisoners

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the current size of the present prison population in Northern Ireland, categorised by age and by sex in the following groups: aged under 18 years, 18 to 25 years, 25 to 30 years, 30 to 40 years, 40 to 50 years, 50 to 60 years and over 60 years; and if he will give a breakdown of the length of sentence being served by percentage of the total prison population;

(2) what is the number of prisoners in Northern Ireland prisons, the age structure of convicted prisoners in the prisons of Northern Ireland and the number of convicted prisoners serving sentences for terrorist offences.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. member as soon as possible.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the manpower strength of the Royal Ulster Constabulary on 31 December 1984; if he will give details of the number of operatives since 1969 in each year for the following categories: Royal Ulster Constabulary full-time, Royal Ulster Constabulary full-time reserve and Royal Ulster Constabulary part-time reserve.

Mr. Scott: The combined strength of the Royal Ulster constabulary and its full-time and part-time reserves on 31 December 1984 was 12,566.

The strength of the RUC, RUC reserve (full-time) and the RUC reserve (part-time) each year since 1969 are set out in the table:

Year 31 December	Royal Ulster Constabulary	Royal Ulster Constabulary reserve (full-time)	Royal Ulster Constabulary reserve (part-time)
1969	3,044	—	—
1970	3,809	—	436
1971	4,086	—	1,284
1972	4,257	153	1,981
1973	4,391	290	2,224
1974	4,564	510	3,350
1975	4,902	661	4,158
1976	5,253	870	3,827
1977	5,692	1,002	3,684
1978	6,110	1,188	3,417
1979	6,642	1,305	3,209
1980	6,943	1,685	3,067
1981	7,334	2,060	2,810
1982	7,718	2,174	2,666
1983	8,003	2,295	2,198
1984	8,127	2,532	1,907

Non-scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give separately for magistrates' courts and for Crown courts in each of the years 1980, 1981 and 1982 and to date, the number of court cases involving non-scheduled offences in which a plea of not guilty was entered; and in how many of these cases a verdict of not guilty was returned.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Weapons

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many weapons were found by the security forces in 1984 for each of the following categories: machine guns, rifles, shotguns, pistols and revolvers, rocket launchers, rockets and others.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

	Number
Machine guns	20
Rifles	69
Shotguns	28
Pistols/Revolvers	70
Rocket launchers	—
Rocket rounds	1
Others	10
Total	198

Hijacked Vehicles

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the years 1983 and 1984 the following details: (a) the number of vehicles hijacked or taken and (b) the number not recovered at the end of each year, in each of the following police districts, separately: Musgrave street, Springfield road, Tennent street, North Queen street, Mountpottinger, Castlereagh, Newtownards, Newry, Portadown, Armagh, Enniskillen, Omagh, Strand road, Coleraine, Ballymena and Antrim.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Department of the Environment (Water Service)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the cost to the Department of the Environment (water service) for (a) legal fees and (b) other costs concerned with contracts that have gone to arbitration since 1976.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 5 February 1985, c. 502]: (a) None; (b) £8,592.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many companies have been unable to fulfil contracts awarded by the Department of Environment (water service) and have subsequently gone into voluntary liquidation since 1976.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 5 February 1985, c. 502]: Five.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many contracts awarded by the Department of the Environment (water service) since 1977 which are now complete (a) have final payments still not made to the contractor and (b) are the subject of arbitration.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 5 February 1985, c. 502]: Three.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many contracts awarded by the Department of the Environment (water service) since 1977 have been forwarded to arbitration and have been resolved; and what has been the cost to the Department on each contract over the agreed tender price.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 5 February 1985, c.502]: No contracts awarded by the Department of the Environment (water service) since 1977 have been forwarded to arbitration and been resolved.

TRANSPORT

Freight Rates

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will publish his study of freight rate disparities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The objective of the study is to compare deep sea freight rates out of the Unite Kingdom and the Continent and to account for any differences observed. In the absence of ready sources of data, my Department has to rely heavily on interviews with shippers, forwarders and shipping lines. These are almost complete and I expect to receive a report shortly. Much information has been provided in confidence but I propose to make the general conclusions available in an appropriate form.

London Regional Transport (Disabled Travellers)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what account he took, in drawing up his legislative proposals and financial arrangements for London Regional Transport, of the needs of the unit for disabled travellers.

Mrs Chalker: The London Regional Transport Act 1984 gave LRT a new statutory duty to have due regard to the transport needs of disabled people. LRT established their unit for disabled travellers in the light of that duty.

The Government's revenue support grant to LRT does not include any specific provision for disabled travellers or for the unit: it is a general grant towards all of LRT's needs.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what funds were allocated to the unit for disabled travellers of London Regional Transport in 1984-85; and what is the amount planned for 1985-86.

Mrs. Chalker: Allocation of funds within LRT is a matter for their Board, bearing in mind their statutory obligations and the objectives set for them by the Secretary of State.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had recently with London Regional Transport about providing a comprehensive public transport system for the disabled.

Mrs. Chalker: I have regular meetings with the chairman of LRT, Dr. Bright, and with his colleagues, and transport for disabled people is a frequent subject of discussions. I aim to ensure as far as possible that, whoever provides the services, transport for disabled people is sensibly co-ordinated.

Merchant Seamen (Health and Safety)

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will, in future, collect and publish statistical data in respect of the number of inspections of United kingdom-registered merchant vessels for purposes of ensuring the occupational health and safety of merchant seamen, the number of warnings, improvement notices and prohibition notices issued and the nature of the infringements for such action, the number of prosecutions mounted for statutory infringements, the nature of those offences and the outcome of the prosecutions, the direct and general costs incurred by that section of his Department which has responsibility for seafarer occupational health and safety and the number of fatal and non-fatal accidents investigated by the marine inspectors.

Mr. Ridley: Marine surveyors from my Department make general inspections of United Kingdom registered ships and in doing so they take into account those requirements affecting the occupational health and safety of seamen. The number of these inspections is recorded. My Department now also records data in respect of improvement and prohibition notices, prosecutions mounted for infringements of occupational health and safety legislation and accidents investigated by marine surveyors. Warnings delivered by surveyors are often verbal and advisory and little would be gained by requiring them to be recorded.

Shipboard accident statistics are already published and, depending upon its general usefulness to the industry, additional information relating to the topics mentioned above will either be published or made available to the industry on request.

The costs in promoting occupational health and safety are incurred across a wide range of activities and to separate them would not be cost effective.

A34 (Gore Hill) and Newbury Bypass

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects work to begin on widening the A34 at Gore Hill; and what progress has been made with plans to build a Newbury bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: Subject to the completion of the statutory procedures, it is hoped to start work this summer on the East Ilsley to Chilton improvement of the A34.

Design of the proposed Newbury bypass, based on the preferred route announced last June, is continuing. I hope to publish draft orders under the Highways Act later this year.

M25 (Service Areas)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if it is still his intention that there will be two motorway service areas fully open on the M25 motorway by the time that motorway is completed.

Mrs. Chalker: All being well, I expect the service area at South Mimms to open by the time the M25 is completed. The timing of the opening of the other three service areas on the M25 depends on the completion of planning and compulsory acquisition procedures, as well as engineering works; but these service areas will follow as quickly as possible.

Toll Charges

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the increases in toll charges on individual bridges and tunnels on roads within his responsibility which have been implemented in each year since 1979.

Mrs. Chalker: The increases made by the undertakings concerned are as follows:

Crossing	Date of increase	Increase		Toll
		Cars Pence	HGVs Pence	Cars Pence	HGVs Pence
England
Severn Bridge	29 April 1979	8	28	20	40
Dartford Tunnel	1 April 1979	10	25	35	85

Privatisation (Safety Monitoring)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent he plans to increase the level of inspecting staff for the purpose of monitoring safety standards resulting from his proposed privatisation of public transport services.

Mr. David Mitchell: We are currently assessing the Department's requirement for vehicle examiners in the light of the proposals in the Transport Bill.

Transport Services (Operating Licences)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of privately run transport services have had their operating licences revoked during the the last five years.

Mr. David Mitchell: Public service vehicle operators' licensing was introduced on 1 April 1981. Statistics of revocations are collected for April-March years. In 1981-82 the traffic commissioners revoked 19 licences, in 1982-83, 17, and in 1983-84, 16. These figures represent about 0·3 per cent. annually of the total number of PSV operators' licences held by private sector operators.

Rail Incident (Todmorden)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange for the publication of the Railway Inspecting Officer's report on the recent incident in Summit tunnel, Todmorden, when it is available.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Regulation of Railways Act 1871, under which the inspecting officer has been appointed to inquire into this accident, requires the publication of his report.

Transport Bill

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what travel concessions will be available on taxis and minibuses under the Transport Bill.

Mr. David Mitchell: Under clause 85 of the Bill a local authority which established a scheme for travel concessions would be required to enter into arrangements with any operator of a registered local service who offered to participate in that scheme. Local services are defined in Clause 2 of the Bill, and are, broadly, those carrying passengers at separate fares on which passengers can travel for less than 15 miles. Such services operated by minibuses and taxis will be treated identically to those operated by large buses.

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the dinner in the west midlands on Tuesday 5 February at which the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Hampshire, North-West (Mr. Mitchell) was to discuss the Transport Bill with local newspaper editors and about which hon. Members were notified by his Department involved any expenditure of public funds.

Mr. Ridley: Yes.

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many dinners have been arranged between departmental Ministers and newspaper editors to discuss the Government's Transport Bill; where these meetings were held; who was present; and what was the total cost to public funds.

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary has met 86 editors in Manchester, Preston, Liverpool, Newcastle, Durham, Doncaster, Leeds, Nottingham and Birmingham as part of a series of visits which also involved meetings with representatives of local authorities. Officials were present on each occasion. The cost of the hospitality will be under £2,000.

I have arranged to hold a similar meeting with editors in Bristol.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax Allowances

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the gain in tax revenue of abolishing the wife's earned income tax allowance; and by how much (i) single person's tax allowance, (ii) married man's tax allowance, and (iii) both allowances could be increased if the amount of revenue gained by the abolition of the wife's earned income allowance were allocated in equal proportion to those other allowances at nil cost to the Exchequer.

Mr. Moore: The yield from abolition of the wife's earned income allowance is estimated to be £3·1 billion in a full year at 1984-85 income levels. This assumes that the wife's earned income election would not be available after the change to those couples who do not benefit from it at present. Without this restriction, the yield from abolition of the allowance would be reduced to about £1·9 billion. Both these estimates also assume no change in taxpayers' behaviour.

If the £3·1 billion was devoted to raising the single allowance, it could be increased by 58 per cent. above its 1984-85 level to £3,175 (this is £20 above the level of the married man's allowance). Alternatively, the married man's allowance could be increased by 28 per cent. to £4,045. If both allowances were raised simultaneously, they could each be increased by 18 per cent.—to £2,365 for a single person and £3,725 for a married man. These estimates all assume that the age allowances would be increased by the same percentage as the corresponding non-age allowances.

Merchant Navy (Tax Concessions)

Dr. Glyn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, when he frames his Budget, he will take into consideration tax concessions to the Merchant Navy to encourage a strong merchant fleet.

Mr. Moore: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Common Agricultural Policy (Contributions)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the contributions which have been made by the United Kingdom to the common agricultural policy fund of the European Community in each single year since 1979.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Under the own resources system member states contribute to the financing of the Community budet as a whole rather than to individual policies such as the common agricultural policy.

Child Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what amount per week child benefit could be raised if it were taxed and the proceeds of taxation allocated to raising its levels.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1985, c.592]: On the assumption that the wife's earned income allowance could not be set against child benefit if it was brought into tax, the level of child benefit could be increased by about £2·40 per week above its average level in 1984-85.

Taxation

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of the loss of tax revenue if the limits on contributions to pensions from earned income were applied to husbands and wives both earning as if they were two single persons.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c.319]: Nil. Individuals may contribute for a pension or retirement annuity up to a given percentage of their remuneration or relevant earnings. These limits are not aggregated in the case of a married couple, both of whom are working and making contributions.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Universities and Polytechnics (Grants)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the grant allocation to universities and polytechnics in each single year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: Recurrent and capital grants made available to universities in Great Britain for each financial year since 1979-80, on the advice of the University Grants Committee and the Computer Board, were as follows:

Financial year	Recurrent £ million	Capital (including equipment grant) £ million
1979-80	741,190	101,271
1980-81	956,464	110,598
1981-82	982,335	116,308
1982-83	*1,193,333	118,926
1983-84	*1,240,181	117,615
†1984-85	1,268,564	124,334

* Includes redundancy and restructuring costs — £57,000,000 in 1982-83 and £38,800,000 in 1983-84.

† Estimates provision.

The figures are not readily comparable from year-to-year because of various funding changes, most notably made to reflect changes in the level of the home undergraduate tuition fee. The real value of this fee was halved for the 1982-83 academic year and further reduced for 1983-84. In both these cases, there were compensating adjustments in UGC recurrent grant. A minor adjustment was also made in 1984-85.

The total allocations for financial years from 1982-83 for polytechnics in England from the capped AFE pool for recurrent expenditure were as follows:

Financial year	£ million
1982-83	371,000
1983-84	377,555
1984-85	388,856

Separate allocations to polytechnics were not made before 1982-83. Capital expenditure on polytechnics is met from their maintaining authorities' total allocations of education capital expenditure, determined annually. Authorities have freedom under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 to determine their own distribution of capital expenditure within their total allocation.

Departmental Objectives

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the principal objectives of his Department for 1985.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department's principal objectives for education are to raise standards and to achieve better value for money throughout the education system. In pursuance of these aims for schools I intend to make progress, in consultation with those concerned in the education service and outside it, in the formulation of broadly agreed curricular objectives; to publish the national criteria for the GCSE examinations and to make progress with the development of grade criteria for incorporation in the national criteria; to prepare for the introduction of records of achievement; to set a target for the removal of surplus places for March 1987 and beyond; and to make further progress in the field of teacher training.

In non-advanced further education the aim is to increase the responsiveness of the service to the needs of the employers while providing a sound education for young people and encouraging improved use of resources. In the short term, a key objective is to implement the decisions set out in the White Paper "Training for Jobs" (Cmnd. 9135).

In higher education the aims are to maintain access for those who want it and are suitably qualified, to promote the necessary improvements in the use of available resources and to encourage the system to be more responsive to the needs of employers. During 1985 it is intended to publish a Green Paper on higher education policy (and a consultative document on student support) setting out the Government's thinking on these matters in more detail.

In science, the Department's aim is to maintain and enhance the strength and quality of the science base in higher education and the research councils. Consonant with this, the objectives in 1985 are to encourage: greater concentration and selectivity of research activities; closer and better working with industry and commerce; more funding from private sector sources; better management yielding greater value for money; and increased flexibility, enabling faster response to new scientific opportunities.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the principal achievements of his Department in the education field in 1984.

Sir Keith Joseph: The principal achievements have been to set in hand the processes needed for the raising of standards at all ability levels and to continue seeking better value for money throughout the education system. The following measures have been taken to these ends:

In the Schools

The definition, in the speech I made at the north of England Conference in Sheffield in January 1984, of longer-term objectives for the schools; and the consequential discussions and reactions;

The decision to introduce the General Certificate of Secondary Education within a framework of national criteria and criteria-related grades;

The decision to introduce, after pilot schemes, records of achievement for school-leavers of all abilities;

The issuing of a consultative paper proposing the introduction of Advanced Supplementary (AS) level examination.

The Green Paper "Parental Influence in Schools" (Cmnd. 9242), which proposed the reform of school government. The many comments received are now under consideration.

Teachers

The establishment of the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education, to evaluate teacher training courses;

The publication by the Department of a discussion paper on school-teacher numbers and deployment in the longer term.

Non-Advanced Further Education

The establishment of a scheme of in-service training grants for further education lecturers;

The establishment of College-Employer Links Projects in eight Local Education Authorities.

Higher Education

The admission to higher education of record numbers of students and also of full-time home students;

Endorsement of the plans of the National Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education for the funding and disposition of academic provision in 1985-86. These provide for a continuation of the significant shift towards science and engineering and other vocational subjects, and for the more efficient use of constrained resources generally, in the public sector of higher education.

Education Support Grants

The provision of grant to support up to £30 million of expenditure on selected activities of national education importance, as provided for under the Education (Grants and Awards) Act 1984.

Youth Services

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the circular on youth services for local authorities is due to be published.

Mr. Brooke: I expect this circular to be published very soon.

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he proposes any changes in staffing responsibilities within his Department in respect of those handling youth matters.

Sir Keith Joseph: Staffing levels are regularly reviewed, in the light of necessary constraints on Civil Service manpower.

National Youth Advisory Council

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what consultations have been made with the various youth organisations and youth services on the composition of the National Youth Advisory Council;

(2) what is the proposed composition of the National Youth Advisory Council.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend stated on 11 July 1984 at column 1036 that he intends to appoint, in conjunction with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, individual members to the youth service advisory body in a personal capacity. In making choices for membership, he will have regard to the broad range of interests in the youth service field and to advice he may receive on membership from those active within it. Due account will be taken of all representations received.

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects the National Youth Advisory Council to be established.

Mr. Brooke: It is hoped to announce the arrangements for an advisory body on youth service matters in the near future.

Medical Students

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of medical students claiming a full year clinical grant for the current academic year; and what are the comparable figures for the period since the academic year 1974-75.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not collected by the Department.

Secondary Schools (Ministerial Visits)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further visits he proposes to make to secondary schools to ask pupils to assess standards of teaching similar to that which he made recently in a school in Coventry.

Sir Keith Joseph: I shall continue to take frequent opportunity to visit schools and to talk when possible with groups of pupils. When referring to teaching standards I have always as I did at Coventry emphasised that I seek no names or identifications.

Iraqi Security Agents

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice his Department gives to universities and other higher education institutions over the presence of Iraqi security agents posing as students.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has received no requests for such advice, which should in any case be sought not from him but from the local police.

ENVIRONMENT

Acid Rain

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list those studies which have been carried out by his Department to establish what relationship exists between the development of nuclear resources and reductions in the deposition of nitrous oxides and sulphur dioxide; and whether he will place copies of these studies in the Library.

Mr. Waldegrave: No such studies have been carried out.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made any estimate of how many additional nuclear power stations would be required to achieve reductions of (a) 15 per cent., (b) 30 per cent. and (c) 60 per cent. in the total emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrous oxides in the United Kingdom assuming that the present number of coal-fired stations was reduced in order to achieve such reductions and that no other measures were taken to achieve these objectives and over what timescales such reductions could be achieved.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government believe that nuclear power will form an increasing component of the country's future electricity supply. This, together with new technologies being developed for cleaner and more efficient fossil fuel combustion, will help to contain future emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrous oxides from power stations. But no estimate of the kind suggested has been made. Achievement of reductions in future emissions is dependent on a number of variables in addition to any increase in the proportion of nuclear generated electricity. These include, for example, the rate of growth of the economy and associated electricity demand.

Conservation

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, following the Government's response to the Countryside Commission's document "A Better Future for the Uplands," he will make it his policy to give grants for the maintenance and improvement of features such as dry-stone walls or small woods.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Countryside Commission, which is financed by grant-in-aid from my Department, operates grant schemes which encourage land management practices that assist conservation.

In addition, higher rates of grant are now available for certain conservation works such as shelter belts, dry stone walls and other traditionally built boundaries under schemes operated by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if Her Majesty's government will impose a moratorium on the deregistration of commons until after the Commons Land Forum has reported, and the recommendations made in its report have been considered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has no power to impose such a moratorium. However, following representations I have had from the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), who is Chairman of the Open Spaces Society, my Department will consider, with the Common Land Forum means of monitoring applications to deregister common land.

Council House Building

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the level of funding available to maintain council home building (a) generally and (b) to provide specialised accommodation.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about the level of resources for public sector housing. The Government's public expenditure plans allow for over £3 billion of public sector investment in housng in each of the next three years. Local authorities have been asked to concentrate their investment on providing for those people in greater need, including those requiring specialised accommodation.

Newcastle upon Tyne

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate how much Government grant Newcastle city council would receive if no penalties were levied upon it under the new system of distribution; and what would be the consequent rate rise on a standstill budget.

Mr. Waldegrave: For a budget of £138 million, the estimated grant before holdback for 1985-86 is £33,706,000. Rate poundage changes depend on the city council's decision on use of reserves.

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate how much grant aid the city of Newcastle upon Tyne would receive if the Government paid grant to the level of the city's grant-related expenditure, without penalties or negative grant; and, on a standstill budget, what rate rise that would necessitate.

Mr. Waldegrave: If grant were paid in 1985-86 on the assumption that all authorities spent at the level of their grant related expenditure assessment, it is estimated that the city of Newcastle's grant would be £39.421,000 before holdback. Rate poundage changes depend on the city council's decision on use of reserves.

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate how much grant aid, in cash terms, the city of Newcastle upon Tyne would receive if the Government provided the same level of support as in 1980-81; and by what percentage the city then could reduce its rates.

Mr. Waldegrave: If the 1985-86 percentage of total estimated relevant expenditure met by aggregate exchequer grant had been the same as in 1980-81, it is estimated that the city of Newcastle's grant in 1985-86 would have been £21,756,000 after holdback for a budget of £138 million. Rate poundage changes depend on the city council's decision on use of reserves.

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the rate increase required by the city of Newcastle upon Tyne to maintain a standstill budget of £138 million; and what would be the amount of central Government grant contribution in cash terms.

Mr. Waldegrave: For a budget of £138 million, the estimated grant after holdback for 1985-86 is £6,106,000. Rate poundage changes depend on the city council's decision on use of reserves.

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the original rate support grant estimate for the current financial year for the city of Newcastle upon Tyne; and what the next year's rate increase would have been, on a standstill budget, had the original grant estimate been adhered to.

Mr. Waldegrave: The original grant estimate for 1984-85 was £40,327,000. This related to a budget equal to target of £122,256,000. Rate poundage changes depend on the city council's decision on use of reserves.

Lea Valley Ice Skating Centre

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money the Sports Council has grant-aided the Lea Valley ice skating centre in (a) capital grants and (b) revenue grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Lea Valley ice centre received a Sports Council capital grant of £1 million towards a total project cost of £2·6 million. No revenue grant was given.

Streatham Ice Rink

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what public funds have been made available to continue public use of the Streatham ice rink.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Sports Council has made available £100,000 for this purpose.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment for what purpose the Sports Council grant-aided the Streatham ice rink to the extent of £50,000; and if he is satisfied that the necessary criteria set for receipt of this money have been met.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The grant was offered to secure the continued availability of the facility, which the Sports Council recognised as having strategic importance in the development of both recreational and competitive ice skating. I understand that the Sports Council's normal conditions of grant apply. In particular, the facility will be kept operative for a minimum period of 10 years (from 29 February 1980). If closed within this period, or if any of the grant conditions are not met, an appropriate proportion of grant will be refunded to the council.

Sports Council

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment who is the accounting officer of the Sports Council.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Mr. John D. Wheatley, the Director-General.

Voluntary Bodies (Salaries)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what instructions are issued by his Department regarding the use and accountability of public funds for paying voluntary body salaries.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Department administers several programmes of direct grants to voluntary organisations. Under each there are established procedures for ensuring that all expenditure, including that on salaries, is reasonable and that public funds are properly accounted for. In the case of grants awarded by the Department's sponsored agencies, it is the responsibility of each agency to ensure that there are proper financial controls over the voluntary organisations they fund. No special instructions about paying voluntary body salaries have been issued by the Department.

National Skating Association

Dr. John Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each year since 1981 the amounts of grant paid to the National Skating Association under the headings of (a) coaching, (b) international and (c) administration and development.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The grant paid was as follows:

	1980-81 £	1981-82 £	1982-83 £	1983-84 £	Total £
Administration	55,024	32,061	53,043	118,599	258,727
Training	42,579	60,000	42,500	85,500	230,579
International	39,500	41,595	10,000	65,939	157,034
	137,103	133,656	105,543	270,038	646,340

Fairs

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to prohibit the use of land for fairs without prior planning permission in all circumstances; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. Temporary planning permission is available in the General Development Order 1977 for the use of land for fairs for up to 28 days in total in any calendar year, and I have no reason to suppose that any changes in these arrangements are necessary.

Permitted Development

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the categories of development permitted without prior planning permission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: We published for public consultation last year a number of proposals to amend the General Development Order 1977, including changes to some of the categories of permitted development set out in that order. Details of our conclusions in respect of telecommunications development were outlined in a reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 25 October 1984 at column 689-90. I am currently considering the results of the consultations on the other proposals. Our overall aim is to keep or reduce planning controls over development to the necessary minimum, while ensuring that they are effective in operation.

Greater London Enterprise Board

Mr. Ground asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will decline to provide financial support for the Greater London enterprise board unless the board either allows its business tenants in Frampton road, Hounslow, to purchase their premises or provides them with suitable alternative accommodation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [pursuant to his answer, 6 February 1985, c. 628]: The Department has received an application from the GLC for consent under the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 for the provision by the GLC of funding for GLEB amounting to £19,991,500 in 1985-86. This application is receiving very careful consideration and my right hon. Friend will take full account of all relevant factors in reaching a decision.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Personal Portable Pensions

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish his conclusions on the public consultation over personal portable pensions.

Mr. Whitney: Our personal pensions proposals are being developed in the light of responses to the consultative document and in the broader context of the Social Security Review. We hope to announce proposals for change following the review in the course of the next few months.

Rheumatology

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each district health authority in England the number of consultants, doctors and nurses employed specifically in the treatment of rheumatology; and if he will express these numbers for each authority on the basis of the number living within the district per employee.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information in the form requested is not available centrally. Figures for medical staffing for each English region at 30 September 1984 are set out in the table.

Baby Care (Conference)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he has had so far to the invitation from his Department to the conference of doctors and pathologists which it wishes to arrange on the care of babies.

Mr. John Patten: The conference has been arranged to focus attention on post neonatal mortality following the publication of the report of the multi-centre study funded by the Department. The response so far to invitations sent to national organisations, representatives of the health professions, individual researchers, and others with a particular interest in their field is very encouraging.

Board and Lodging Payments

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what reply he has sent to the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders in response to its submission to the Government objecting to proposals to reduce the level of board and lodgings payments to social security claimants.

Mr. Whitney: We have received a copy of representations made to the Social Security Advisory Committee by the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders. These will be taken into account, along with all the other representations received, when we are considering the comments of the Social Security Advisory Committee on our proposals.

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the estimated numbers of supplementary benefit claimants receiving board and lodging benefits in the following age groups in each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984: (a) 16 and 17 years, (b) 18 to 25 years, (c) 26 years to retirement age and (d) over retirement age.

Mr. Whitney: All the information in the form requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The available information is as follows:

Supplementary benefit claimants in ordinary board and lodging accommdation (including hostels and common lodging houses)

	1979	1980	1981	1982	*1983
Aged 16–17	—	—	—	4,000	7,000

Ambulancemen

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the levels of pay earned by ambulancemen each year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: Estimates, derived from various sources for each year except 1982 , of average gross weekly earnings (excluding London allowance) of all ambulancemen in Great Britain are as follows:

June of	£
1979	93·92
1980	129·95
1981	141·56
1983	153·55
1984	160·46

Homeless Young People

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to assess the effect on the number of 16 to 17-year-olds registered as homeless of his proposals to withdraw their benefit allocations.

Mr. Whitney: I assume the hon. Member is referring to our proposals to reform the arrangements for making board and lodging payments under the supplementary benefit scheme. It would be premature to make plans at this stage for monitoring the effects of implementing proposals on which the comments of the Social Security Advisory Committee and the Government's response have yet to be published.

Hospital Expenditure (Outside Contractors)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of total hospital expenditure in England and Wales was accounted for by contracted-out services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Contracted out services accounted for 2·35 per cent. of health authorities total current expenditure in 1983-84. We have defined total current expenditure for this purpose to exclude expenditure on National Health Service Central Services and also payments made to doctors, dentists, opticians, and chemist contractors providing family practitioner services. The information in health authorities accounts does not enable us to give a separate percentage for hospital services within the total, which also includes expenditure on services such as ambulances and community health.

Prescriptions

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each of the past five years the total number of prescriptions and their total cost, at 1984 prices, written by general practitioners; and what assumption he has made for planning purposes of the total number and total cost for each of the next three years, at 1984 prices (a) including and (b) excluding any limited list effect.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Pensions

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the United Kingdom population is in receipt of statutory retirement pension; and how this figure compares with other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Whitney: It is estimated that in mid-1983 some 17 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom were in receipt of a state retirement pension. This estimate excludes pensioners living outside the United Kingdom and relates to receipt of either contributory or non-contributory retirement pension.

Because of variations in pension age between member states of the European Community, information is not available centrally on the proportion of people over specific retirement ages receiving a state retirement pension. Such information as is available is contained in the publication "Eurostat: Demographic Statistics: 1984", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the United Kingdom population is of pensionable age; and how this compares with other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Whitney: The most up-to-date and readily available information† is as follows:

Country	*Percentage of population of pensionable age
United Kingdom	18
Federal Republic of Germany	18
France	16
Italy	16
Netherlands	14
Belgium	16
Luxembourg	16
Ireland	13
Denmark	17
Greece	16

* To facilitate comparison, the population of pensionable age has been defined as the number of females aged 60 and over plus the number of males aged 65 and over.

† Figures for countries other than United Kingdom have been compiled from Eurostat "Demographic Statistics", Statistical Office of the European Communities (1984). All figures relate to 1982 except United Kingdom (1983), Italy (1981) and Greece (1981).

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the United Kingdom Government spending goes to paying for pensions for retired persons; and how this compares with other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Whitney: It is estimated that in the financial year 1984-85, some 14 per cent. of United Kingdom Government expenditure relates to pensions for retired persons. The definition of public expenditure is that used in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428); pensions for retired persons are defined to include state retirement pensions, supplementary pension, the rent element of housing benefit and includes retirement pensions payable to people outside the United Kingdom. Comparable estimates for other member states of the European Community are not readily available and I shall write to the hon. Member.

AIDS

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce the outcome of his review of the public health implications of making acquired immune deficiency syndrome a notifiable disease.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We hope to make an announcement shortly.

Private Pensions

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the United Kingdom population is in receipt of private pension; and how this figure compares with other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that information is not available in the form requested. The following estimates, derived from the family expenditure survey, show the number of occupational pensions in payment in Great Britain in 1982.

They include pensions for widows and dependants and those awarded in early retirement. They do not include pensions which people have arranged for themselves. We are not aware of any similar estimates for other member states.

	Estimated number of pensions in payment of 1982 (millions)
Payable to people under pension age	1·0
Payable to people over pension age	3·0
TOTAL	4·0
	per cent.
Pensions in payment as a percentage of total estimated Great Britain population in 1982	7·4

Doctors (Prescribing Habits)

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out the criteria which determine when a general practitioner's prescribing habits are subject to scrutiny and review.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The prescribing costs of all National Health Service general medical practitioners are examined annually on the basis of information provided by the Prescription Pricing Authority.

Agency Nurses (Liverpool)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nurses were employed on an agency basis by the Liverpool health authority at the latest available date; how this figure compares with those for each of the three previous years; and what was the principal source of these agency nurses.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Figures for 1983, the latest date for which district figures are available, and 1982, the only previous year for which district figures are available, are shown in the table. We do not collect detailed local information centrally on the source of supply of these nurses.

Liverpool Health Authority
Number of Agency Nurses (whole time equivalents)

September 1983	17
September 1982	4

NHS (Private Contracts)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what interventions he has made in decisions taken by district and regional health authorities to award National Health Service hospital contracts to private firms; and what consultations he sought with hospital union staff when this action was taken.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have intervened only when there were good reasons to believe that health authorities had taken or intended to take decisions which were not in the best interests of patients. We do not consider that it is necessary for us to consult the unions on these matters.

Contraceptive Sponge

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he intends to conduct in respect of cancer risks emanating from the use of the sponge device in girls under the age of 16 years who do not obtain contraceptives through a doctor.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: None. When the Committee on Dental and Surgical Materials recommended the granting of a licence for the spermicidal sponge, "Today", they took account of all the available evidence and were satisfied as to the safety of this product for the proposed use. The spermicide in the sponge is also used in a number of other licensed contraceptive products.

Wintex '85

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what part he expects nurses, doctors and other health workers to play in the Wintex '85 exercises.

Mr. John Patten: There are no plans for nurses, doctors or other health workers to play a part in the exercise.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if representatives of the regional health authorities have been involved in the preparations for the Wintex '85 exercises.

Mr. John Patten: Regional health authority representatives have not been involved in the preparations for this exercise.

Supplementary Benefit

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received resulting from his proposals to terminate the entitlement to supplementary benefit to claimants under the age of 18 years.

Mr. Whitney: None. We have made no such proposals. Entitlement of young people to supplementary benefit is one of the issues being considered in the review of social security, the outcome of which we hope to announce in the course of the next few months. Representations were invited on this issue following the announcement of the review in April last year, and all those submitted are being carefully considered.

Health Authorities (Land)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why nearby local residents were not consulted by Waltham Forest district health authority before it decided to lease its land opposite Leyton green for the purpose of a fair; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The conditions of the licence restricted the hours in which the fair could operate and required that the site would be kept clean and tidy and that the volume of generators and music would be kept low. As, additionally, the licence required the fair operator to obtain all necessary permissions from the local authority and as officers of the health authority discussed the licence with officers and councillors of the local authority, the health authority did not consider it necessary to consult local residents before granting the licence for the fairground.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what dates (a) the police and (b) the London borough of Waltham Forest were informed by Waltham Forest district health authority that a fair would be operating on its land opposite Leyton green with effect from 4 February.

Mr. John Patten: The police were not informed of the decision to grant a licence. An initial discussion with the local authority took place on 30 January and was followed by subsequent discussions at the health authority's offices and at the site.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the decision of Waltham Forest district health authority to enter into a lease to use its land opposite Leyton green for the purpose of a fair was (a) an administrative one, (b) authorised by the chairman or (c) agreed by the health authority members board.

Mr. John Patten: In line with the authority's standing orders and standing financial instructions, it was an administrative decision.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue guidelines to health authorities not to lease or rent out their land without first consulting nearby local residents, the police and other relevant public authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Health authorities are authorised to act on behalf of the Secretary of State in land transactions and they are responsible for ensuring that any necessary consultation is carried out. However, in the light of the case which the hon. Member has raised I will consider the need for guidelines and will write to the hon. Member in due course.

Drugs Bill

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the drugs bill as a proportion of total National Health Service spending in each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The proportion of total National Health Service expenditure attributable to the cost of drugs (excluding the cost of dispensing) was:

Benefits and Pensions (West Midlands)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of claimants of unemployment and supplementary benefits and pensions in the west midlands region in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Benefits

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take to prevent incorrect benefit payments being allocated to claimants of social security.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to her on 7 February.

Hospitals and Community Health (Expenditure)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which individual areas will benefit from the extra spending to be devoted towards hospitals and community health in 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Regional health authorities will determine the distribution to health districts of the nearly £500 million additional cash this Government have made available in 1985-86.

NHS (Private Beds)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the charges for private beds in National Health Service hospitals in each year since June 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We determine charges for private resident patients in health service hospitals for each period of 12 months beginning 1 April. The amounts are shown in the tables, but changes in the classification of hospitals mean that yearly comparisons are not valid in many cases.

Leukaemia (West Cumbria)

Dr. John Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the progress of investigations and research recommended in the Black report about the incidence of Leukaemia in west Cumbria.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have commissioned research projects which will implement the first three recommendations of the report and expect to commision a further project shortly to implement the fourth recommendation. Work is under way and the results of this research will become available over the next three years.

We are still discussing with other Government Departments, outside bodies and clinicians from West Cumbria the best means of carrying out the other research and investigations recommended in the report.

Employment of Children Act 1973

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he intends to make available to local authorities to enable them to implement the Employment of Children Act 1973.

Mr. John Patten: As the hon. Member is aware, local authority associations were consultated in 1975 and 1977 on the implementation of the Employment of Children Act 1973. It was concluded, that, because of the resource implication for local authorities, the introduction of the Act's provisions could not be justified. It is still considered to be inappropriate to impose further responsibilities on local authorities.

Deaf Students

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many deaf students have completed courses at residential training courses for the disabled and Manpower Services Commission skillcentres in each of the past five years; how many such students were placed successfully in employment; and within what periods.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply. I regret that this information is not available.

DEFENCE

Northern Ireland

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the strength of the Army in Northern Ireland on 31 December 1984, broken down as between the Ulster Defence Regiment, the Regular Army and the Territorial Army.

Mr. Stanley: The information is as follows:

	Strength of Army
Ulster Defence Regiment	6,468
Regular Army	9,110
Territorial Army	3,479
	19,057

The figures for the Ulster Defence Regiment includes full time and part time soldiers. Soldiers of the Territorial Army are not used in support of the RUC in counter-terrorist operations.

Pay

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list, rank by rank, the pay increments allocated to service men in the Army, the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force since June 1982.

Mr. Stanley: Full statistics relating to the pay of service men can be obtained from the annual reports of the Armed Forces Pay Review Body and the Top Salaries Review Body which, following their consideration by the Government, are published and made available to the House. However, for ease of reference the following table provides details of the maximum and minimum daily rates of pay for male officers and soldiers in the Army. The maximum rates for soldiers include the highest level of lengths of service increment payable to each rank. The rates of pay for Royal Navy and Royal Air Force personnel are broadly equivalent rank for rank. Rates of pay at 1 April 1982 are given so that the increase since June 1982 can be seen.

Wintex-Cimex '85

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the countries that will take part in the Wintex '85 exercises; which countries will have forces in the United Kingdom; and what activities will take place in the northern region;

(2) if he will make a statement on the activities of Wintex-Cimex '85 that will take place in the north-east of England.

Mr. Stanley: As I said in my reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 30 November 1984 at column 597, Wintex-Cimex '85 is a NATO-wide command post exercise conducted by Alliance members; as such, United States headquarters personnel in the United Kingdom will participate. In the north and north-east of England staff in service headquarters and selected lower formations will be involved. Details of the scenario for the exercise and the play itself are classified. All members of the Alliance will be involved in the exercise, apart from Greece which is not participating on this occasion. Since France and Spain are not part of the integrated military structure they will be involved only as observers.

Nuclear Tests (Radiation)

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Defence what efforts are being made to examine medically all civilians involved in Christmas Islands atomic tests.

Mr. Butler: The health study currently being undertaken by the National Radiological Protection Board includes civilians who were involved in the British atmospheric nuclear weapon test programmes in Australia and the South Pacific, and is intended to show whether participants, as a group or groups, have been disadvantaged by their involvement in the tests. As many of the civilian participants were and have since continued to be radiation workers, they have received regular medical examination in the course of their normal duties. However, no medical examinations are involved directly as part of the NRPB study, which is being conducted on the basis of existing records.

Departmental Staff (Outside Appointments)

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his Department's and armed services' staff have applied for positions in defence industries in the United Kingdom and the United States of America by year from 1979 to the present; how many were successful; and if he will list in the Official Report the organisations or industries to which they moved.

Mr. Butler [pursuant to his answer, 5 February 1985, c. 512]: The number of applications received in respect of proposed appointments with British and American defence companies is as follows:

	United Kingdom defence companies				USA defence companies in contractual relationship with the Ministry of Defence
	Applicants	Numbers approved	Conditions imposed	Refused	Applicants	Numbers approved	Conditions imposed	Refused%

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

COCOM

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will introduce an export control order to implement the recent COCOM agreement; and if he will make a statement concerning the delay which has elapsed.

Mr. Channon: Details of the new rules on exports on computers, software and telecommunications switching equipment were finally agreed by all the COCOM member states on 1 January 1985; and the details of the new rules on other items on the COCOM lists only on 1 February. My intentions to implement in United Kingdom law all the new arrangements at the same time by means of the new Export of Goods (Control) Order, which my right hon. Friend hopes to make in March.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make the Export of Goods (Control) Order putting into effect the COCOM agreement.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend expects to make the order towards the end of March and expects that it will come into force some weeks later.

Weights and Measures

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the hourly fees charged by his Department for the examination of weighing machines submitted for type approval represents the wages of examiners, travel and accommodation costs and overheads, respectively.

Mr. Fletcher: The hourly rate for pattern examination work is made up as follows, based on 1983-84 costs:

	Per cent.
Examiner staff costs	37
Supervisory and support staff costs	11
Accommodation	21
Other costs	31

Travel and subsistence expenses are invoiced separately to submitters. The staff costs include superannuation and employers' national insurance contributions.

Imports and Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing imports and exports from and to the EEC Six for the years 1962 to 1984 together with the trading surplus or deficit and the respective share of total United Kingdom imports and exports of manufactures;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1962 imports and exports of manufacturers from the present European Free Trade Association countries plus Denmark, the resultant surplus of deficit and the respective share of total United Kingdom imports and exports of manufactures.

Mr. Channon: The information is in the tables. The data are on the "Overseas Trade Statistics" basis, that is, imports include freight and insurance costs, while exports do not.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the percentage increase in United Kingdom imports of manufactured goods in 1984; and how this compares with the increase in world trade.

Mr. Channon: The volume of imports of manufactures into the United Kingdom rose by 10 per cent. in 1984, in line with recent estimates of the increase in world trade.

Exports

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the percentage of world trade taken by the United Kingdom's exports for the years 1974 to 1984, inclusive, and his forecast for the current year.

Mr. Channon: The United Kingdom share of world trade is normally taken as the United Kingdom's share of exports of manufactures by the main manufacturing countries. Details of these shares are given in table E1 of the latest edition of the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics" and the "Annual Supplement No. 5 (1984)", copies of which are in the Library. Forecasts of these figures are not available.

Comecon (Trade Statistics)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the United Kingdom's trade figures with the individual Comecon member states in each year since 1981.

Mr. Channon: The information is as follows:

Value £ million

	1981 United Kingdom		1982 United Kingdom		1983 United Kingdom		1984 (provisional) United Kingdom
	Imports	Exports	Imports	Exports	Imports	Exports	Imports	Exports

Pit Closure Areas (Employment)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he intends to make for the purpose of providing alternative sources of industrial employment in regions affected by the coal pit closures proposed by the National Coal Board.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Pirate Radio Stations

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many pirate radio stations are operating within the United Kingdom; how many are operating offshore or otherwise outside the United Kingdom; and if he will list them.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 6 February 1985, c. 580]: Since the beginning of 1984, my Department has monitored 74 unlicensed broadcasters on radio, including two marine stations located beyond United Kingdom territorial waters which aim their transmission at the United Kingdom. In addition, one unlicensed broadcaster on television has been monitored. Some 23 of these have been known to broadcast continuously for considerable periods on a daily basis. The rest transmit only intermittently. It would not be cost effective to monitor all frequencies of the radio spectrum continuously and there may be more unlicensed users of broadcast frequencies who transmit occasionally and who have not come to the attention of the Department.

The names and locations of unlicensed broadcasters on radio who have been monitored since the beginning of 1984 are as follows:

SCOTLAND

Management Grants Scheme

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will consider introducing a similar grants scheme in Scotland to the management grants scheme operated under the special grants programme of the Department of the Environment in relation to local voluntary action;

(2) if he will produce a guide to grants for voluntary bodies working in environmental fields similar to that produced by the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has already noted this proposal for consideration when his officials have completed a review of the exercise of powers to grant aid to such bodies in Scotland. Until a decision has been reached, it seems premature to consider the question of producing a guide to financial sources.

Oil Industry (Habitat Scotland Report)

Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be able to comment on the Habitat Scotland report on the environmental impact of North sea oil-related developments on Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: I wrote to the director of Habitat Scotland on 5 February with comments on the report. I have placed a copy of my letter in the Library.

Scottish Development Agency (Tourist Projects)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many of the Scottish Development Agency's service industries division's projects being considered for financial support are related to tourism.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 30 January 1985, c. 205]: The planning and projects directorate of the Scottish Development Agency is examining 15 possible projects with a tourism component with a view to establishing their potential viability.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear-free Zones

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards efforts by other countries to establish nuclear-free zones; and what is the policy concerning such zones when they are established.

Mr. Luce: We believe that the establishment of nuclear weapon-free zones in certain parts of the world could contribute to regional security, to non-proliferation and to disarmament in general, provided that nuclear weapons do not already feature in the security of the region involved and all states concerned are prepared to participate on the basis of agreements freely entered into and in keeping with internationally recognised principles. The zone created by the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America of 1967 is a good example. We give that Treaty our full support, as is evidenced by our ratification in 1969 of Additional Protocols I and II. We would like to see all the states which are entitled to do so become parties and to see the treaty enter into force in the entire region.

Syrian Nationals (Deportation)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Syrian Government regarding the four men holding Syrian passports who were arrested by the Metropolitan police and deported on 29 January on the grounds that their presence in the United Kingdom was not conducive to the public good.

Mr. Luce: The Syrian charge d'affaires was summoned to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 5 February. He was left in no doubt of our grave concern about the circumstances which led to the deportation of the four men and was asked to provide clarification of a number of specific points.

Grenada

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what part his Department has played in the work of the Commonwealth study group, set up after the upheaval in Grenada, to consider the future defence of small states; what assistance Her Majesty's Government is prepared to give in any regional forces that may be set up; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend sent an analysis of the security problems of small states and of high potential remedies to the Commonwealth Secretary General at the outset of the study last year. The Secretary General subsequently established an independent, non-governmental group to assist his study, the British member of which is Sir A. Parsons.

We provide substantial assistance to small states. This amounted to over £60 million of development aid and military training assistance to 29 Commonwealth small states in 1983-84. We also support the establishment of regional security arrangements among small states and give considerable assistance to the countries belonging to the regional security system in the eastern Caribbean. On 30 October last year, we announced the grant of £1·2 million for the construction of shore facilities for coastguard patrol vessels in six of these countries. I refer my hon. Friend to my Department's memorandum published by the Foreign Affairs Committee on 19 July 1983 (HC 541) for further details of our approach.

Peter Nadin

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of the answer given to the hon. Member for Islington, North by the Lord Privy Seal on 10 January concerning the death of Peter Nadin in Greece in July 1984, Official Report, columns 911-12, he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Her Majesty's embassy in Athens is seeking the co-operation of the Greek authorities and is asking them to review the investigations already made to see what scope there may be for further inquiries into the circumstances or Mr. Nadin's death.

Iraq (Diplomats)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many representatives of the Iraqi Government have accredited diplomatic status in the United Kingdom; and if any of these are active on security duties.

Mr. Luce: 28. None of these, so far as we know, are engaged on duties related to the security of embassy premises.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings his Department has had with the ambassador from Iraq concerning the activities of security forces from that embassy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: There have been no such meetings. The activities of all diplomatic missions in London are kept under review. We do not hesitate to make representations when we have clear evidence of unacceptable activities by their members. Should we receive such evidence concerning the embassy of Iraq, we would take appropriate action with the Iraqi ambassador.

Libya (British Hostages)

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the release of the four British hostages in Libya.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am delighted at the safe return of the four British Citizens detained in Libya since mid-May 1984.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear in the House, the Government are deeply grateful to the Archbishop of Canterbury for undertaking this humanitarian mission and pay tribute to his special representative, Mr. Terry Waite. We have co-operated closely with Mr. Waite in his efforts, and are grateful to those friendly Governments who intervened at our request, particularly to the Italian protecting power.

We have consistently made clear that there was no question of bargaining over the freedom of our hostages. We have, however, said that after their release we would be willing to consider ways of improving relations.

We are now ready to hold a meeting between Libyan and British officials under Italian auspices to discuss matters of concern to each side. As a humanitarian gesture the British interests section in Tripoli will also be authorised to accept visa applications in certain urgent medical and compassionate cases.

The welfare of the remaining British community in Libya of about 5,000 is still major concern. Their treatment will be an important measure of Libyan intentions. I would remind those British citizens who travel or work abroad that there are limits to the consular protection we can provide. Those who go to Libya do so on their own responsibility and that of the Libyan authorities to whom we look to ensure their safety.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 72

SESSION 1984–85

28th January—8th February 1985

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speakers ruling and statement'.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading 'Speaker'.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of the volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
